Reading · The Rumour about the Youth Room

A message claimed that the youth room would close permanently. The actual meeting notes said something different. The manager had explained that repairs would take two weeks and that activities could use the library during that period. A parent had asked whether evening sessions would continue. The manager had promised to check staffing, not guaranteed that every session would run. Someone shortened this into 'They don't know what they're doing', and the temporary move became a permanent closure in later messages. Our youth council published a correction with the confirmed dates and the unresolved question clearly separated. We also asked members not to forward claims without the original notice. The response was mostly positive, although one person complained that the correction was less dramatic than the rumour. That was true. Accurate information often has fewer villains and more conditions. It is still the information people need when arranging transport, work and childcare around a real service.

Listening · The Review Panel's Notes

Reporter: The panel said our project had useful aims but needed a clearer budget. They did not reject the idea completely.
Team leader: What questions did they ask?
Reporter: They asked how we would maintain the equipment and whether volunteers had agreed to the schedule. They told us to separate one-time costs from monthly expenses.
Team leader: Did they offer another review?
Reporter: Yes. They offered to read a revised plan next month. They also suggested testing demand with a small pilot first.
Team leader: Then our next message should explain the work required, not announce either a victory or a disaster.
Reporter: Exactly. I have kept their written comments beside my summary so we can check the meaning.
Team leader: Good. We should be proud of the useful parts and honest about the gaps.
Reporter: A conditional opportunity is still an opportunity. It just arrives with homework rather than a celebratory ribbon.

Writing namuna — urinishdan keyin

The panel said our project had useful aims but needed a clearer budget. They asked how the equipment would be maintained and whether volunteers had accepted the schedule. They told us to distinguish initial costs from monthly expenses. They also suggested a small pilot to test demand before expansion. Importantly, they offered to review a revised plan next month. This was neither an unconditional approval nor a complete rejection. Our team should use the written comments to prepare specific changes. A fair summary will help everyone understand the opportunity and the work attached to it. We should report both the positive assessment and the conditions instead of choosing the more dramatic version.

A neighbourhood chat reported that the small swimming pool was closing permanently. The claim began after an instructor told a parent that lessons would stop during roof repairs. The parent wrote, 'She said the pool would close next month.' Another member removed the time reference when forwarding the message. By evening, several families had cancelled future bookings. The manager asked who had announced a permanent closure. Nobody could identify such a statement. She explained that the building would close for twelve days and asked families to check the official timetable before changing plans. The instructor confirmed that she had meant a temporary pause. A student reporter interviewed both speakers and published their words with dates. The correction did not accuse the parent of inventing the entire story; it showed how an accurate detail had lost an essential limit as it travelled.

Reading · The People behind the Repair Table

A repair cafe depends on more than the person who holds the screwdriver. Our team includes a volunteer who welcomes visitors and a coordinator who keeps each item with its paperwork. The objects that arrive often carry stories as well as faults. Last week, a lamp that belonged to a retired teacher needed a new switch. The volunteer who assessed it asked about its history before discussing the repair. That conversation did not replace technical judgement, but it helped explain why the owner preferred repair to replacement. We also need a system that records limits honestly. Items that cannot be repaired safely are returned with an explanation, not a vague promise. Some visitors are disappointed, yet clear boundaries protect trust. The most useful volunteer is not always the one who says yes fastest. It may be the person who asks the question that prevents a well-intentioned but unsuitable repair.

Listening · Choosing a Volunteer Role

Advisor: We need someone who can listen patiently at the welcome desk. Technical knowledge isn't essential for that role.
Applicant: I enjoy talking to people, but I don't want to give repair advice that I am not qualified to give.
Advisor: That's the right boundary. You will record the problem that the visitor describes and pass the item to a trained volunteer.
Applicant: What about customers who expect an immediate answer?
Advisor: Explain the process and introduce them to the person who handles assessments. We use a form that makes the next step clear.
Applicant: I can do that. I worked at a library where people often needed help finding the right service.
Advisor: Useful experience. The welcome desk is not just a place that produces a friendly smile. It connects a person's question with the team member who can actually help.
Applicant: Then I would like to try a supervised session.

Speaking

Ikki daqiqada uch ko‘ngilli rolini relative clause bilan ajrating va bitta chegarani tushuntiring.

Mezon: Who odamni aniqlaydi. · Which/that buyumni yoki tizimni aniqlaydi. · Uch gap ortiqcha takrorsiz bog‘langan.

Writing

100–120 so‘zda kutib olish rolini yangi ko‘ngilliga tavsiflang.

Mezon: 100–120 so‘z bor. · Kamida uch defining relative clause to‘g‘ri. · Rol vazifasi va vakolat chegarasi aniq.

Writing namuna — urinishdan keyin

The welcome volunteer is the person who connects visitors with the right member of the repair team. They record the problem that each visitor describes and keep the item with its form. They should not give technical advice that goes beyond their training. A customer who expects an immediate answer can be introduced to the volunteer who carries out assessments. This role requires patience and clear communication, not just a friendly manner. The form that the team uses should explain the next step. A supervised first session would help a new volunteer practise these tasks and learn when to ask for support rather than make an uncertain promise.

Reading · The Market Archive

Our town archive is collecting stories from traders whose families have worked in the market for generations. The project began in the cafe where several retired sellers meet every Thursday. One woman remembers the winter when the old roof collapsed under heavy snow. Another recalls the year when refrigerated vans changed the fish trade. These memories connect personal experience with changes in the town, but dates sometimes conflict. The archivist records uncertainty rather than forcing every account into one neat timeline. A photograph whose owner is unknown can still be useful if its limits are stated. The team asks contributors to explain where their knowledge comes from: direct experience, a relative's story or a later newspaper report. This does not make the interviews less warm. It makes the archive more trustworthy. A market is a place where stories travel quickly; an archive is a place where they should also arrive with a source.

Listening · The Community Mentor

Host: Tell us about the person whose advice changed your project.
Designer: Her name is Farida. She runs the workshop where I first tested my furniture designs.
Host: Do you remember the day when you met her?
Designer: Yes. I brought a chair whose legs looked elegant but were unstable. She asked who would actually sit on it.
Host: A practical question.
Designer: Very practical. We visited a centre where older people meet, and they explained what made a chair comfortable to use.
Host: Did that change your priorities?
Designer: Completely. I still care about appearance, but I now start with the people whose daily routines the object will enter.
Host: So advice became observation.
Designer: Exactly. Farida didn't give me a perfect design. She showed me a place where I could ask better questions. My chair stopped being a drawing that expected humans to adapt politely to it.

Speaking

Mezon: Whose dan keyin egalik oti bor. · Where joyga, when vaqtga ishora qiladi. · Uch bog‘lanishning oldingi oti aniq.

Writing

100–120 so‘zda bozor arxivi uchun ma’lumot yig‘ish tamoyilini yozing.

Mezon: 100–120 so‘z yozilgan. · Whose/where/when uchalasi to‘g‘ri. · Manba va noaniqlik mezoni aniq.

Writing namuna — urinishdan keyin

The market archive should preserve the voices of traders whose experience connects personal lives with local history. Interviews can begin in the cafe where retired sellers already meet. Contributors may remember the year when a new roof was built or a different trading system appeared. Their dates may not always agree, and that uncertainty should remain visible. A photograph whose owner is unknown should be labelled honestly rather than given an invented history. The team should ask whether each detail comes from direct experience, a family story or a written source. This approach respects contributors while giving future readers enough information to understand the evidence and its limits.

Reading · The Volunteer We Almost Missed

The volunteer who arrived late to our planning meeting became the person we most needed. Kamila, who works at a bus depot, noticed that our event timetable ignored the last service to the northern neighbourhoods. The schedule we had prepared looked convenient for the organising team, but several visitors would have struggled to get home. Our chair suggested simply telling people to leave early. Kamila argued that they should not have to miss the final discussion because of where they lived. We moved the closing session forward and kept an optional social hour afterwards. The change, which cost nothing, made the event more accessible. It also challenged our assumption that useful planning knowledge comes only from senior organisers. Kamila had no formal role in transport policy. She knew the route people used every evening. The person who notices an ordinary practical detail may contribute more than the person whose presentation has the most impressive title.

Listening · The Book You Recommended

Friend: I finished the book you recommended. The writer, who used to manage a community garden, gives very practical examples.
Reader: Did the chapter about volunteers help?
Friend: Yes. The checklist she includes is useful, but the advice about opening hours mattered most. Our garden closes before many people finish work.
Reader: That's a problem we can discuss at Saturday's meeting.
Friend: Could you come with me? You know the members who attend in the evening, and they trust your judgement.
Reader: I can. Bring the notes you made, but let's ask people about their needs before proposing a fixed solution.
Friend: Agreed. The book gives us questions, not a universal timetable.

Reader: Exactly. A useful guide, which can save us time, still needs local knowledge. Otherwise, we may copy a beautiful plan that belongs to a completely different neighbourhood.

Writing namuna — urinishdan keyin

Hi Aziza,
The book you lent me helped with our garden project. Its author, who managed a similar garden, explains why opening hours matter. Could you join Saturday's meeting and describe what evening visitors need? Please bring your timetable notes. Let's ask the group before choosing new hours.
Thanks,
Malika

Reading · A Venue beyond the Photograph

The Riverside Centre, where our association held its first public meeting, looks ideal in promotional photographs. Its manager, whose team welcomes many community groups, is also helpful. However, a recent visit showed why a venue decision needs more than an attractive image. The room to which we were initially directed was upstairs, and the lift was too small for some mobility equipment. The room downstairs, which had fewer seats, offered easier access and a quieter entrance. We asked whether furniture could be rearranged to increase capacity without narrowing the route. The manager agreed to measure the space with us. This was not a dispute about whether the centre was 'good' or 'bad'. It was a discussion about which room suited our particular event. The people with whom we consulted included wheelchair users and parents with pushchairs. Their observations turned a general promise of welcome into a practical plan that could be checked.

Listening · The Museum Room Request

Organiser: The curator, whose exhibition opens next month, would like our discussion to happen beside the display.
Access advisor: The gallery, where the display is installed, has a narrow entrance. The people for whom we are planning include users of larger wheelchairs.
Organiser: Could we use the education room instead?
Access advisor: Yes. That room has a wide doorway, and the portable display could be brought there. The curator should confirm which objects can move safely.
Organiser: I will write to her with those questions. The person we spoke to yesterday mentioned folding chairs too.
Access advisor: Ask how many can be arranged while keeping a clear route. Capacity is not simply the number of chairs in storage.
Organiser: Good point. We need a plan people can use, not a photograph of every chair we own squeezed into one impressive rectangle.

Writing namuna — urinishdan keyin

Dear Ms Karim,
I am writing about the room for our association's public meeting. The Riverside Centre, where we held our first event, remains our preferred venue. However, the upstairs room may not suit participants who use larger mobility equipment.
Could you confirm whether the downstairs room is available on 18 June from two to five? We would also appreciate a seating plan showing how many chairs can be arranged while keeping a clear route from the entrance. The members with whom we consulted emphasised the importance of that space.
Your team, whose assistance we value, offered to measure the room with us. Would Tuesday afternoon be convenient for a short visit? Please also confirm whether any furniture can be removed temporarily.
Thank you for helping us plan an event that all participants can use comfortably.
Yours sincerely,
Malika Saidova

Reading · The Queue Outside the Clinic

People waiting outside the community clinic had no shelter during last month's rain. A temporary canopy installed near the entrance now offers some protection. The clinic also introduced numbered cards, which reduced arguments about places in the queue. However, the new system created another problem: visitors unable to hear the number calls sometimes missed their turn. A volunteer suggested a visual display showing the current number. Staff tested a simple whiteboard before buying equipment, which allowed them to discover practical issues cheaply. The board placed behind the reception glass reflected light and was difficult to read. Moving it beside the door solved much of the problem. These changes show that an improvement can help one group while overlooking another. The team now asks visitors using different communication methods to test each stage. A fair queue is not created merely by giving everyone a number; people also need a reliable way to know when that number matters.

Listening · The Exhibition Labels Test

Designer: Visitors reading the first display spent much longer there than we expected.
Researcher: Was that interest or difficulty?
Designer: We asked them. Several said the text was too small, which changed our interpretation of the timing.
Researcher: Good. Time spent near a display doesn't explain itself.
Designer: Labels printed in a larger size were easier to use. But the version placed low on the wall was missed by people standing behind others.
Researcher: Then we need to test position as well as size.
Designer: Exactly. The volunteers helping today will observe from several heights and distances.
Researcher: Include people using seats or mobility equipment, not just standing staff.
Designer: We will. The first result looked like a success until we asked what the visitors were actually experiencing. A long visit can mean fascination, but it can also mean somebody is trying very hard to read three stubborn lines.

Speaking

Ikki daqiqada navbat tizimining foydasi va cheklovini ixcham aniqlovchi gaplar bilan tahlil qiling.

Mezon: Butun fikrga which bir marta ishlatilgan. · -ing bilan qisqartirilgan aniqlovchi bor. · V3 aniqlovchi to‘g‘ri otga tegishli.

Writing

100–120 so‘zda ko‘rgazma kuzatuvidagi noto‘g‘ri taxminni tahlil qiling.

Mezon: 100–120 so‘z yozilgan. · Ikki reduced relative va gapga which bor. · Kuzatuv va talqin farqi dalillangan.

Writing namuna — urinishdan keyin

Visitors spending a long time at a display are not necessarily highly engaged. In our test, several people were struggling with small text, which changed the meaning of the observation. Labels printed in a larger size helped, but those placed too low were hidden by other visitors. The next test should include people standing, sitting and using mobility equipment. Volunteers observing from different positions can identify problems that a single viewpoint misses. We should combine timing with direct questions about the experience. Otherwise, a measurement that looks positive may conceal difficulty. Useful evaluation asks what the behaviour means, not only how long it lasts.

Reading · The Park Survey We Redesigned

The first park survey reached people who already attended weekend events. Residents whose working hours included Saturdays were largely absent. The committee initially called the results representative, which overstated what the evidence could show. We redesigned the survey with short interviews at the bus stop where commuters waited and a paper version delivered to nearby buildings. Responses collected through the new routes raised different priorities: lighting, toilets and weekday seating mattered more than another festival stage. This did not make the first respondents wrong. It showed that the people we had asked were only part of the community. The report now explains each collection method and the groups still missing from the sample. The council officer to whom we sent it requested a follow-up discussion. A survey becomes more credible when it admits its limits. The most polished chart cannot give a voice to residents who were never asked a question in the first place.

Listening · The Accessible Film Discussion

Host: The films selected by our club cover several neighbourhood stories. The filmmaker who opens the programme will join us online.
Member: Will the captions be available for the discussion as well as the films?
Host: That's a good question. The system we're using supports captions, but we need someone to check them.
Member: My colleague, whose job includes live caption review, may help. The room where we meet also needs a clear view of the screen.
Host: We can test that on Thursday.
Member: Please include participants sitting at the side, not only those in the centre.
Host: Agreed. Last time, we checked the equipment but not every viewing position, which left some people with a poor experience.
Member: Then the test should follow the audience's journey from entrance to discussion. Access is not one feature we switch on at the beginning and forget.

Writing namuna — urinishdan keyin

Dear Mr Ahmed,
I am writing about the park survey that our committee recently revised. The original responses came mainly from people who attend Saturday events. Residents whose jobs keep them busy at weekends were not adequately represented, which limited the conclusions we could draw.
We have now added interviews at the bus stop where commuters wait and paper forms delivered to nearby buildings. The responses collected through these routes place greater emphasis on lighting, toilets and weekday seating.
Could you arrange a meeting to review these priorities before the next spending decision? We would also appreciate information about groups that the council believes are still missing from the survey. The report, which explains both collection methods, is ready for discussion.
Thank you for considering a broader evidence base rather than treating the first chart as a complete picture.
Yours sincerely,
Malika Saidova

A park survey asked visitors which benches they liked. Most responses praised a new wooden bench beside the pond. The council planned to copy it throughout the park. Then an access volunteer, whose group had not received the survey, pointed out that the path to that bench was too narrow for some mobility aids. People who could not reach it were unlikely to evaluate it. The council invited another group, including residents who usually entered through the north gate, to walk the proposed sites. They preferred benches with arms that made standing easier. The wooden design was comfortable, but its popularity did not settle every design question. The revised plan includes both wider paths and different seat heights. Consultation is stronger when it reaches people for whom the existing arrangement already creates a barrier.

Reading · Why We Changed the Workshop

Our photography club decided to redesign its beginner workshop after several learners avoided returning for a second session. They enjoyed taking pictures but disliked spending most of the evening watching slides. The tutor had hoped to explain every camera setting before allowing practice. That plan seemed thorough, yet it asked beginners to remember too much without using it. We invited learners to describe one task they wanted to achieve. Most wanted to photograph people indoors without producing a bright forehead and a dark background. The new session begins with that practical problem. Learners try a simple adjustment, compare results and then discuss the principle. We still expect them to understand the settings, but explanation follows an immediate need. The change is not an argument against theory. It is an argument for a sequence that makes theory useful. A camera course should leave people wanting to take photographs, not merely admiring the instructor's impressive collection of menus.

Mezon: Enjoy/avoid + -ing to‘g‘ri. · Decide/hope + to-infinitive to‘g‘ri. · Want/expect + object + to bor.

Writing

Mezon: 100–120 so‘z bor. · Uch fe’l qolipi to‘g‘ri. · Taklif o‘quvchi dalili va cheklov bilan asoslangan.

Writing namuna — urinishdan keyin

The club decided to begin its workshop with a practical indoor photograph. Learners enjoy taking pictures, but they avoid returning when the session feels like a long tour of camera menus. The tutor should ask them to identify one problem and help them to test a simple adjustment. They can then compare results before studying the explanation. This does not mean removing theory. It means connecting theory to a task learners want to achieve. I would also suggest keeping the first practice short so everyone has time to discuss it. A successful introductory session should encourage people to continue learning rather than convince them that photography requires memorising everything at once.

Reading · Learning from a Broken Display

The museum let our student team test a new interactive display before opening it to visitors. We could explore the controls, but we had to avoid changing the stored information. One unexpected screen message made us laugh: it congratulated us on selecting no options at all. The joke revealed a real problem. The display allowed people to continue without making a meaningful choice. We went through the activity again to identify the point where instructions became unclear. Several students were interested in improving the wording, while others focused on the size of the buttons. Instead of arguing about personal preference, we asked two first-time users to try the display. Their difficulties helped us decide what to change. Testing did not prove that our final version would suit everyone, but it gave us better evidence than guessing. A machine can respond quickly and still fail to explain what a person is supposed to do.

Listening · Preparing the Repair Demonstration

Leader: Let me explain the demonstration before we start. You can handle the sample parts, but you must ask before touching the live equipment.
Volunteer: I'm interested in learning how the checks work. Can I stand near the technician to see clearly?
Leader: Yes. We have moved the table to create more space. Don't be afraid of asking a basic question.
Volunteer: The technician's joke made everyone relax last time. That helped people admit they didn't understand.
Leader: Exactly. We want the group to learn, not perform confidence. After watching the demonstration, you can practise on the disconnected sample.
Volunteer: I'll bring my notebook to record the steps.
Leader: Good. A useful note should explain the reason for a check as well as its order. Remember, recognising a tool is different from knowing when and why to use it. Accuracy matters more than finishing first.

Reading · When Instructions Become Work

Reading the instructions for our booking form took longer than completing the form itself. The guide was accurate, but it was too dense to use quickly at the reception desk. Important warnings sat between background explanations and technical definitions. We tested a shorter version with new volunteers. Finding the next step became easier, although some unusual cases still required the full guide. The solution was not to delete complexity entirely. We created a short action sheet and linked each section to the detailed reference. Using plain language helped people notice the exceptions instead of hiding them in a wall of text. The new sheet was clear enough to support routine tasks, but not broad enough to answer every possible question. That limit was stated at the top. Good instructions do not promise to remove all judgement. They make ordinary decisions easier and show users when to seek help. Our reception desk now has fewer pages and fewer panicked whispers.

Listening · The Feedback Form Debate

Coordinator: Collecting feedback is useful, but our form is too long to finish before people leave.
Researcher: Shortening it would help. What decisions do you need the answers for?
Coordinator: We need to know whether the session was clear and what people want to practise next.
Researcher: Then two focused questions may be enough to guide the next session. It's important to leave space for an unexpected concern too.

Coordinator: Is that enough information to evaluate the whole programme?
Researcher: No. A quick exit form is not detailed enough to judge long-term change. We need a later follow-up for that.
Coordinator: So different questions need different methods.
Researcher: Exactly. Asking fewer questions is not automatically better, but asking twenty questions without knowing how you will use the answers is a very organised way to collect dust. We can pilot the shorter version next week.

Speaking

Ikki daqiqada yo‘riqnoma yoki anketa sifatini maqsadga qarab baholang.

Mezon: Gerund ega sifatida ishlatilgan. · Too … to va enough … to farqlangan. · Adjective + to bilan baho dalillangan.

Writing

100–120 so‘zda qisqa so‘rovning foydasi va chegarasini tahlil qiling.

Mezon: 100–120 so‘z bor. · Gerund ega va ikki too/enough qolipi bor. · Qisqa va uzoq muddatli baholash ajratilgan.

Writing namuna — urinishdan keyin

Collecting feedback is useful only when the team knows how the answers will inform decisions. Our current form is too long to complete before participants leave. Two focused questions could be enough to improve the next session: was the explanation clear, and what needs more practice? It is also important to allow an unexpected concern. However, an exit form is not detailed enough to demonstrate lasting change. That requires a later follow-up. Shortening the form should therefore support a specific purpose rather than create an illusion of complete evaluation. Asking fewer, better questions can save time while leaving room for a different method when deeper evidence is needed.

Reading · A Different Way to Commute

I used to drive to the training centre, but the new parking fee encouraged me to try taking the bus. At first, I was not used to waiting outside in bad weather. I tried to read on the journey, but motion made that uncomfortable, so I tried listening to short audio lessons instead. That worked better. One morning, I stopped to buy a ticket and forgot to collect the receipt I needed for reimbursement. I remember telling the driver about my course, but not checking the machine. Now I set a reminder to keep the receipt. The change has not made every journey pleasant. Some buses are crowded, and the evening connection is unreliable. Still, I have stopped assuming that driving is always the only practical choice. A trial should allow mixed results. Otherwise, one wet morning becomes proof against buses, while years of traffic delays somehow count as normal life.

Listening · The Booking Software Trial

Manager: You used to keep bookings on paper. Are you used to working with the new software now?
Assistant: Mostly. I remember saving Tuesday's changes, but the screen didn't confirm them. I tried refreshing the page, which helped.
Manager: Did you remember to check the final list afterwards?
Assistant: Yes. One name was missing, so I stopped entering new bookings to investigate. I didn't stop to take a break.
Manager: Good distinction. What support would help?
Assistant: A clear error guide. We are trying to learn the system, but repeated guessing wastes time.
Manager: I'll request one from the provider.
Assistant: Please ask them to explain recovery steps, not only normal use. Most guides assume everything goes well.
Manager: Agreed. A manual that only describes perfect conditions is rather like an umbrella designed exclusively for sunny photographs. Please include this example in your written request.

Writing namuna — urinishdan keyin

Dear Support Manager,
Our reception team is getting used to working with your booking software after several years of paper records. We are trying to use it consistently, but the system sometimes gives no confirmation after changes are saved.
On Tuesday, an assistant remembered saving an updated list and tried refreshing the page. One name was still missing. She stopped entering further bookings to investigate and checked the final list carefully.
Could you provide a clear recovery guide covering missing confirmations and incomplete records? We would also appreciate a short training session focused on errors rather than normal operation. Please explain how staff can verify that an update has been stored without creating duplicate bookings.
We would be grateful for a reply by Friday so that we can plan next week's reception cover.
Yours faithfully,
Malika Saidova

Reading · The Shared Office Adjustment

Our charity recently moved into a shared office, and we are getting used to working beside two other teams. At first, small habits caused surprising tension. We turned the heating up while our neighbours opened a window. We depended on informal messages, but nobody knew who was responsible for locking up. After a meeting, we wrote a short agreement and had the faulty door lock replaced. We also got the meeting-room screen repaired instead of asking volunteers to fix it without training. The agreement includes turning lights off, looking after shared equipment and checking with other teams before moving furniture. These rules are not a substitute for courtesy, but they reduce repeated uncertainty. I am interested in how quickly trust improves when responsibilities become visible. A shared office does not require everyone to work in the same way. It requires people to notice where one team's convenient habit becomes another team's daily problem.

Listening · The Community Computer Desk

Volunteer: I'm getting used to helping people with very different levels of computer experience.
Coordinator: Good. Remember that being good at using a device doesn't automatically mean being good at explaining it.
Volunteer: I noticed that. I told one visitor to turn it off and on again, but I spoke too quickly.
Coordinator: Break the instruction into steps and let them try. What happened to the old printer?
Volunteer: We had it serviced yesterday. The technician replaced a worn part, so we didn't need a new machine.
Coordinator: Excellent. We depend on donations, so maintenance matters.
Volunteer: A visitor asked whether we could look after her laptop overnight.
Coordinator: Explain that we cannot store personal devices. She can bring it back during opening hours.
Volunteer: Clear boundaries again.
Coordinator: Yes. Helpful service means knowing what support we can provide, not taking on every responsibility that arrives in a bag.

Speaking

Ikki daqiqada umumiy ofisga moslashish va ta’mir buyurtmasi haqida gapiring.

Mezon: Getting used to + -ing to‘g‘ri. · Bitta ajraladigan va bitta ajralmaydigan phrasal verb bor. · Have/get + object + V3 xizmatni bildiradi.

Writing

100–120 so‘zda umumiy ofis kelishuvi nima uchun foydali ekanini tushuntiring.

Mezon: 100–120 so‘z bor. · Causative va get used to to‘g‘ri. · Uch phrasal/dependent birikma ma’noga mos.

Writing namuna — urinishdan keyin

Our team is getting used to sharing an office with two other organisations. We initially depended on informal messages, which left some responsibilities unclear. After discussing the problems, we had the faulty lock replaced and got the meeting-room screen repaired by a technician. The new agreement asks everyone to turn lights off, look after shared equipment and check before moving furniture. These rules help us cooperate without expecting identical working habits. They also show when professional help is needed. Being interested in repairs is not the same as being qualified to perform them. Clear responsibilities protect both equipment and relationships, leaving more time for the work our teams actually came to do.

Reading · A Better Welcome for New Members

Our community workshop wants to attract new members without overwhelming them. We used to begin with a long tour and ask everyone to remember every rule immediately. Several newcomers admitted feeling lost, although they appreciated the volunteers' friendliness. We decided to try offering a short welcome task instead. A trained member helps each person to label a sample item, find the correct storage place and practise recording a loan. Doing one complete task makes the wider system easier to understand. We still expect people to read the safety information, and they must not use unfamiliar equipment without guidance. The team also had damaged signs replaced and is getting used to explaining fewer details at once. Some experienced members worry that the new approach is too simple. We will therefore review errors and newcomer feedback after four sessions. The aim is not to remove standards. It is to help people reach them through a sequence they can actually follow.

Listening · The Training Proposal Review

Director: Why do you recommend changing the induction session?
Coordinator: New volunteers enjoy helping people, but they struggle to remember twenty procedures before trying any of them. I suggest starting with one supervised task.
Director: Would that be enough to prepare them?
Coordinator: Enough for a first step, not for independent work. We would still require them to read the safety guide and ask before using unfamiliar equipment.
Director: What else needs attention?
Coordinator: We should have the unclear signs replaced. We also need to stop assuming that silence means understanding.
Director: How will you check the new approach?
Coordinator: By observing errors, listening to feedback and asking volunteers to explain the next step in their own words.
Director: Good. Please send a written proposal with a four-session review point. A simpler beginning is useful if it leads to stronger understanding, not if it merely makes the timetable look less demanding.

Writing namuna — urinishdan keyin

Dear Ms Rahim,
I am writing to propose a revised introduction for new workshop volunteers. Several newcomers have admitted feeling overwhelmed by the number of procedures presented before they can practise anything.
I suggest beginning with one supervised task: labelling an item, finding its storage place and recording a loan. Completing this sequence should make the system easier to understand. Volunteers would still be required to read the safety guide and ask before using unfamiliar equipment.
We should also have the unclear signs replaced and stop treating silence as evidence of understanding. Could you approve a four-session trial of this approach? We would review errors, collect feedback and ask participants to explain the next step in their own words.
Please let me know whether the trial can begin next month and who should coordinate the review.
Yours sincerely,
Malika Saidova

Our chess club enjoys welcoming new players, but many leave after their first evening. The committee considered reducing the membership price. A volunteer suggested asking recent visitors about their experience before deciding. Several reported feeling lost because regular members began games immediately and expected newcomers to understand the pairing board. They did not mention the price. The committee agreed to try a welcome table and asked two experienced players to explain the system. Members who prefer starting immediately can still do so. The club also stopped describing the beginner session as a tournament, since that word made some visitors expect formal competition. Next month the committee plans to compare return visits and collect short comments. It hopes to make participation easier without promising that every visitor will become a regular member.

Reading · A Library Beyond Office Hours

The district library proposes opening until nine on two evenings each week because many residents finish work after its current closing time. A consultation received eighty responses, and fifty supported the change. However, the responses came mainly from existing members, so they cannot represent every household in the district. Staff suggest a six-week trial rather than a permanent extension.

The additional hours would use the present budget by shortening two quiet mornings. This matters because a longer timetable is not automatically a larger service. Parents who visit with young children might lose a convenient session. The manager therefore wants attendance recorded by time and purpose, not just as one impressive total.

Some opponents worry about noise outside the entrance. That concern deserves a practical response, such as clear closing announcements and a staff presence at the door. It does not prove that evening access is unnecessary. Equally, supporters should not describe every quiet morning as wasted time: a few visitors may depend heavily on it.

The trial should compare who gains access and who loses it. Due to limited staffing, the final choice must balance different needs rather than promise that every visitor can have every hour.

Listening · The Repair Shop's Evening Experiment

Owner: Customers keep asking us to stay open later. Because they collect appliances after work, our five o'clock closure causes difficulties. I'm considering Thursday evenings.

Technician: I understand the demand, but the workshop isn't simply a collection desk. Repairs require concentration, and tired staff may make mistakes.

Owner: I wasn't proposing a longer working week. We could start later on Thursdays due to the additional evening shift.

Technician: Then our morning customers would face the same problem in reverse. Some older customers travel before the buses become crowded.

Owner: Fair point. What evidence would help us decide?

Technician: Record actual collection requests for a month. Telephone enquiries are useful, but someone asking about late opening isn't necessarily someone who will use it.

Owner: Could we separate repairs from collections? One person could manage completed orders between five and seven.

Technician: Possibly, provided no technical diagnosis is promised then. People sometimes arrive with what they call a tiny question and unpack an entire washing machine problem.

Owner: So the trial notice needs clear limits.

Technician: Exactly. I support testing access, not advertising services we cannot safely provide. Let's review collection numbers and missed morning visits together before making the arrangement permanent.

Writing namuna — urinishdan keyin

Hi Nila,
I'm pleased about the evening library trial because I usually finish work late. Still, I'm worried about parents losing their morning visits. I'll send the manager a suggestion to record both groups' needs during the six weeks. Shall we try the first Thursday session together?
Best,
Aziza

Reading · When a Trial Looks Successful

A neighbourhood pool introduced discounted lunchtime entry for six weeks. Attendance rose by a third, so its first report called the scheme a clear success. Although more people entered the building, ticket income fell slightly. The report also omitted whether the new visitors were previously inactive or simply changed the time of their usual swim.

This does not mean the discount failed. A public facility may reasonably prioritise access over income. Nevertheless, the purpose needs to be stated before the results are judged. If the aim was to reduce crowding in the evening, the relevant evidence is evening occupancy, not merely lunchtime attendance.

Despite these gaps, the experiment produced one useful finding. Several nearby office workers formed a regular swimming group and reported that a fixed meeting time helped them continue. Their comments suggest a social benefit, though a small group cannot speak for everyone.

The next report should therefore compare attendance across the whole day and include staff costs. It should also ask occasional users why they stopped coming. An attractive photograph of a busy pool is encouraging; however, a photograph cannot show who stayed away or whether the improvement lasted after the discount ended.

Listening · Discussing a Faster Check-In

Manager: Our new kiosk has reduced the average check-in time, so I want to remove the old reception desk.

Receptionist: Although most guests finish quickly, some need help with names, languages or access requests. Their waiting time has increased because one employee now handles every difficult case.

Manager: The average still improved by three minutes.

Receptionist: Yes, but an average can hide very different experiences. A guest who finishes in thirty seconds and another who waits fifteen minutes do not receive the same service.

Manager: Would keeping both systems defeat the purpose of automation?

Receptionist: Not necessarily. Despite the kiosk's speed, we still need a visible route to personal assistance. We could reduce the desk rather than remove it.

Manager: That would preserve part of the staffing cost.

Receptionist: It would. However, repeated complaints also consume staff time. Yesterday I explained the same error to six guests because nobody had updated the on-screen instructions.

Manager: Then let's improve those instructions and measure assisted check-ins separately.

Receptionist: Agreed. I am not defending a desk for sentimental reasons. I want us to remove unnecessary work without removing necessary help. After another fortnight, we can compare both speed and unresolved problems instead of relying on one average.

Writing namuna — urinishdan keyin

Dear Library Manager,
Thank you for inviting comments on the proposed evening opening trial. I support testing later access because residents who work during the day may currently be unable to visit.
Although the proposal offers a clear benefit, shortening two mornings could disadvantage parents and older members. I therefore suggest recording attendance separately for each affected session rather than reporting only the total number of visits. Please also ask users whether the revised timetable prevents them from accessing a service they need.
Despite the staffing limits, a six-week trial should provide useful evidence if its aims are published in advance. Could the final report include both evening demand and lost morning access? This would help members understand the eventual decision and suggest realistic adjustments.
Yours sincerely,
Aziza Karimova

Reading · A Tool Library or a Cheap Drill?

Two neighbourhoods have chosen different ways to make household tools affordable. One runs a lending library, whereas the other negotiates discounts at a hardware shop. The library spreads the cost of rarely used items across many borrowers. The discount scheme gives people permanent access, but each household still needs storage and maintenance.

Supporters of lending point to a carpet cleaner that was borrowed thirty times in one year. It was such a popular item that the library bought a second machine. Yet not every tool circulates so well. An unusually heavy drill remained on its shelf because beginners found it intimidating. The collection therefore needs regular review rather than endless expansion.

The shop scheme is simpler to administer. Customers choose their own products, while volunteers only arrange the discount. However, a cheaper purchase can still be unnecessary. One resident admitted that his bargain drill had spent longer in its attractive box than outside it.

Neither approach is automatically more responsible. Lending works best when collection times, training and repairs are reliable. Discounts are more suitable for equipment people use frequently. The sensible question is not which scheme sounds more generous, but which one matches actual patterns of use and the capacity of local volunteers.

Listening · Two Ways to Learn a Language

Tutor: One course offers live weekly meetings, whereas the other provides recorded lessons. Which arrangement suits your team?
Supervisor: Recordings are easier for shift workers. Our timetable changes so frequently that a fixed meeting excludes someone almost every week.
Tutor: That is a strong argument. On the other hand, live sessions create an immediate reason to prepare. Some learners collect recordings without actually watching them.
Supervisor: Our team is motivated, but I accept that access is not the same as participation.
Tutor: Exactly. Last term one group had such a large video library that members didn't know where to begin. We replaced it with a short weekly sequence and a discussion slot.
Supervisor: Could we keep the discussion optional?
Tutor: Yes, although optional activities need a clear purpose. A meeting to solve actual communication problems is more attractive than a meeting merely to prove attendance.
Supervisor: Then recordings can introduce language, while a fortnightly session deals with examples from work.
Tutor: That sounds realistic. We should still provide feedback for people who cannot attend.
Supervisor: Agreed. I don't want flexibility to become a polite word for studying entirely alone. Let's test the combination with one team before purchasing access for the whole organisation.

Writing namuna — urinishdan keyin

Owning every household tool is convenient, but convenience alone does not make every purchase sensible. I would support a small lending library for equipment that residents use only occasionally.
A carpet cleaner is a good example. In the reading, one machine was borrowed thirty times in a year. Sharing it reduced the need for many families to buy and store the same bulky item. A lending service can also offer practical instructions, which matter more than an attractive discount for an inexperienced user.
However, borrowing has real disadvantages. Collection times may be inconvenient, and a damaged tool can interrupt somebody's project. A library that keeps expanding without enough volunteers may promise more than it delivers. Meanwhile, someone who uses a drill every week has a reasonable case for owning one.
I therefore favour a mixed approach. Share expensive items with low individual use, while arranging discounts for frequently needed equipment. Review borrowing records before adding more products, and publish clear repair and collection arrangements. The aim should be useful access rather than the largest possible collection. Otherwise, our community may simply create a much bigger cupboard of objects that nobody uses.

Reading · A Market Prepared for Rain

The organisers of a neighbourhood market have ordered removable covers in order to keep the event outdoors during light rain. They will not cancel merely because the forecast mentions showers. Instead, they have agreed on clear conditions for moving indoors, including strong wind and standing water near electrical equipment.

Volunteers will inspect the site before stalls open. They will keep a paper list of sellers in case the mobile connection fails, and they will call each seller if the venue changes. The distinction matters: a backup is prepared beforehand, whereas a call follows a specific decision.

Some traders argue that preparation creates unnecessary expense. Their concern is understandable after two completely dry years. However, the covers can be reused, and the alternative indoor space requires an advance reservation anyway. Waiting until the first storm would leave everyone competing for the same limited room.

The team also plans signs so that visitors can find the indoor entrance without asking at every stall. As soon as a move is confirmed, one volunteer will update the website while another checks the street signs. The plan does not eliminate bad weather; it prevents ordinary uncertainty from turning into several contradictory announcements delivered through increasingly wet phones.

Listening · Preparing a Remote Workshop

Trainer: I'll send the worksheets today so that participants can download them before the workshop.
Assistant: Should we also send a recording link in case somebody loses connection?
Trainer: We won't have a recording until afterwards. For now, send a short summary and a telephone contact. If a participant disconnects, we can help them rejoin.
Assistant: Some people may think the summary replaces the workshop.
Trainer: Then explain its purpose. It is a backup, not the whole lesson. We need live discussion to compare the examples.
Assistant: When should I admit people from the waiting room?
Trainer: As soon as you verify their names. Keep unfamiliar names waiting until we confirm registration, but contact them privately rather than announcing a problem to everyone.
Assistant: I also want to test captions in order to support participants who need them.
Trainer: Good. Test the technical vocabulary first. Last week's automatic captions turned 'project funding' into 'project pudding', which was memorable but not useful.
Assistant: I'll check the key terms and keep a written glossary beside the slides.
Trainer: Exactly. Preparation should make participation easier without promising that technology will be perfect. After the session, we can ask which backup materials people actually needed and revise the system accordingly.

Writing namuna — urinishdan keyin

Hi Bek,
The market's rain plan sounds sensible. I'll print the seller list in case the connection fails, and I'll help update signs if we move indoors. Could you check the covered entrance with me before stalls open? That should save visitors from wandering around in the rain.
Cheers,
Malika

Reading · Repairing More Than Objects

A volunteer repair cafe advertises both practical assistance and opportunities to learn. Visitors can either leave a simple item with a volunteer or remain at the table and observe the process. Neither option guarantees a successful repair, and the organisers state that clearly on the booking form.

The learning element is not only a pleasant extra but also a possible way to reduce future waste. For example, a visitor who learns to clean a blocked filter may avoid replacing an appliance unnecessarily. Nevertheless, the cafe does not record such later decisions, so it cannot claim to have measured every environmental benefit.

Its strongest evidence is modest and specific: during the last session, volunteers restored eighteen of twenty-seven items. Four needed unavailable parts, while five were unsafe or beyond the team's expertise. Publishing those categories builds more trust than announcing that the event 'saved everything'.

Some residents would prefer a paid repair service with a fixed deadline. That is a reasonable alternative, especially for essential equipment. Moreover, volunteers should not be expected to replace professional services for every household. The cafe's value lies in extending options, sharing knowledge and directing difficult cases elsewhere. A successful community project can acknowledge its limits without turning its publicity into an apology.

Listening · A Museum's Two Ticket Options

Director: We can either offer a low fixed price or introduce a voluntary contribution. Both approaches are more accessible than our current ticket.
Treasurer: A voluntary contribution may work, but income would be less predictable. Neither goodwill nor a busy entrance automatically pays for maintenance.
Director: True. It could attract people who assume the museum is beyond their budget.
Treasurer: Then we should test that claim. For instance, ask visitors whether price influenced their decision, without making them justify their finances at the desk.
Director: I like that. The change should not only increase attendance but also make people feel welcome.
Treasurer: And we need clear wording. 'Free entry, suggested contribution' means something different from a compulsory charge with a friendly name.
Director: Some donors might compensate for lower payments.
Treasurer: They might; however, we should not build the entire budget on that hope. Keep a reserve and review income monthly.
Director: So a three-month pilot, private optional feedback and a visible explanation of where donations go?
Treasurer: Yes. I support a carefully measured experiment. I simply want the museum to remain open after the enthusiastic launch photographs have disappeared from everyone's feed.
Director: Fair enough. Our announcement can describe the opportunity and the uncertainty together.

Dear Market Coordinator,
Thank you for sharing the proposed wet-weather arrangements. I support preparing both removable covers and an alternative indoor venue, since waiting for severe weather could leave traders without a workable option.
I would be pleased to help not only with printed seller lists but also with the entrance signs. Clear signs would reduce confusion for visitors, while a paper contact list would remain useful if the mobile connection failed. For example, one volunteer could update the website as another checks the physical directions.
Could you confirm who will authorise a move indoors and how that decision will reach volunteers? Neither sellers nor visitors should receive conflicting messages. I suggest testing the contact chain before market day and naming one person responsible for the final announcement.
Yours sincerely,
Malika Saidova

Reading · Who Benefits from the Car-Free Sunday?

The town's first car-free Sunday drew a large crowd into the central square. Cafes reported strong sales, while a furniture shop said customers could not collect bulky purchases. Both reports may be accurate because businesses use the same street in different ways. A single total for visitor numbers would miss that distinction.

The organisers closed the road in order to create space for walking and public activities. They also provided a delivery window before nine. However, the notice reached some traders only two days beforehand, so several existing collections could not easily be rearranged. Better communication would address that problem without necessarily abandoning the event.
Residents raised a different concern: traffic moved into neighbouring streets. Although the square was quieter, those households experienced more noise. The next trial should therefore monitor surrounding roads as well as the closed area. Otherwise, an improvement in one visible location may simply transfer inconvenience elsewhere.
A second event is justified if organisers use the first as evidence rather than as a celebration that cannot be questioned. They should publish both gains and costs, consult people beyond the square, and announce arrangements early. Success means a workable balance of access and public space, not merely a photograph with fewer cars.

Listening · Should the Shared Desk Trial Continue?

Team Lead: Our shared-desk trial has reduced unused office space, but the feedback is mixed. We need a recommendation for the next quarter.
Analyst: The savings are clear. However, staff who need specialised equipment spend time rebuilding their workspace each morning.
Team Lead: Could we reserve a few permanent stations so that those tasks remain efficient?
Analyst: Yes. Either a fixed station or a reliable equipment locker could help, depending on the role. We should ask about tasks rather than rank people by seniority.
Team Lead: Some colleagues say fixed desks would undermine fairness.
Analyst: Equal furniture is not always equal access. A worker using two calibrated monitors has a different requirement from someone mainly attending meetings.
Team Lead: What about social contact? The trial was supposed to encourage new conversations.
Analyst: We have comments about that, but no consistent evidence. People may meet different colleagues while also losing contact with their immediate team.
Team Lead: Then we should retain the trial and revise its rules?
Analyst: For another month, yes, provided we measure setup time and missed collaboration as well as space savings. Keep spare stations in case bookings fail. The system should support work, not turn finding a chair into everyone's first project of the day.
Team Lead: I'll present that as a conditional recommendation.

Writing namuna — urinishdan keyin

I would support another car-free Sunday, but not a monthly commitment yet. The first event showed that the square can become an attractive public space. It also revealed problems that deserve more than a photograph.
Cafes benefited from visitors, whereas a furniture shop struggled with collections. These experiences do not cancel each other out. They show why organisers need to consider different kinds of business. An early delivery window is useful, but traders must receive enough notice to rearrange existing appointments.
The traffic in neighbouring streets is an important issue. A quieter square is not a complete success if nearby households receive all the displaced noise. The next trial should count traffic around the area as well as inside it and invite comments from those residents.
Some supporters may worry that further checks will delay a popular idea. I understand that concern, yet a short evaluation could prevent repeated mistakes and strengthen support. Announce the next date early, publish the delivery arrangements, and compare benefits with inconvenience afterwards. If the revised event improves access without simply moving problems elsewhere, a regular programme would have a stronger case. Public enthusiasm is valuable, but practical evidence should shape the final timetable.

The town closed one shopping street to cars for four Sundays so that families could walk more comfortably. Pedestrian counts rose, and a café reported stronger sales. However, the pharmacy near the far entrance received fewer older customers. Its owner supported cleaner air but said that the nearest accessible parking space was too distant. The first report celebrated the total increase without mentioning that distribution.

A transport officer proposed moving two accessible spaces closer and allowing deliveries before the pedestrian hours began. Although that would reduce the length of the completely car-free section, it might preserve access for people who could not walk far. The café owner worried that exceptions would confuse visitors, whereas the pharmacy owner thought a clear sign could explain them.

The council will continue the trial in order to test the revised arrangement. It will record both total visits and access complaints. More pedestrians are evidence of use, not proof that every resident benefits equally. A successful trial should identify which parts work and which need adjustment, rather than turn a promising change into a claim that no problems remain.

Before the second trial, a researcher spends an ordinary Sunday walking the approaches to the street. She notices that the busiest entrance has a smooth pavement, while the route from the bus stop includes a high kerb. A simple count at the central square would miss that difference. She asks volunteers to record where visitors enter and whether they turn back, without assuming why every person changes direction.

The pharmacy owner also points out that sales figures are imperfect measures of access. A customer may successfully collect medicine without buying anything extra, while another may buy several items on behalf of neighbours who stayed at home. The café's higher sales and the pharmacy's lower visitor count therefore describe different aspects of the trial. They should be reported separately rather than forced into one score.

For the next report, the council will publish the dates and observation periods beside each figure. Weather, opening hours and the location of signs will be noted too. The officer does not expect this record to remove disagreement. She hopes it will make the disagreement specific enough to act on. Residents will be able to ask whether a proposed change addresses a documented barrier, instead of being asked to declare themselves simply for or against a car-free street.

h-25-1 · Match café owner, pharmacy owner and officer to their concerns/proposal.

Ustoz kaliti: Café: confusing exceptions; pharmacy: access with clear signs; officer: closer accessible parking/early deliveries.

Dalil: The café owner worried that exceptions would confuse visitors, whereas the pharmacy owner thought a clear sign could explain them. / moving two accessible spaces closer and allowing deliveries h-25-2 · What mechanism may explain fewer older pharmacy customers?

Ustoz kaliti: Accessible parking was too far away.

Dalil: the nearest accessible parking space was too distant.

h-25-3 · Why is increased pedestrian traffic insufficient to establish equal benefit?

Ustoz kaliti: The total conceals reduced access for some customers.

Dalil: The first report celebrated the total increase without mentioning that distribution.

h-25-4 · Why continue rather than immediately declare permanent success?

Ustoz kaliti: To test revised access arrangements and monitor complaints as well as totals.

Dalil: continue the trial in order to test the revised arrangement. It will record both total visits and access complaints.

h-25-5 · Why cannot café sales and pharmacy visitor counts simply become one success score?

Ustoz kaliti: They measure different activities; medicine access can succeed without additional purchases.

Dalil: The café's higher sales and the pharmacy's lower visitor count therefore describe different aspects of the trial.

h-25-6 · Why record observation dates and periods?

Ustoz kaliti: To make comparisons interpretable alongside weather, hours and signs.

Dalil: the council will publish the dates and observation periods beside each figure.

Reading · The List Is Not the Community

The list of registered volunteers is growing, but the coordinator is cautious about calling that growth a stronger community. A name on a list indicates interest; it does not show how often someone participates or whether the work is useful. Everyone receives a welcome message, yet not everyone finds a suitable first task.

The centre has introduced short introductory shifts. A group of experienced volunteers meets newcomers and explains what each role involves. This is more demanding than sending a general invitation, but early feedback suggests that people appreciate knowing whom to ask for help. Nobody is expected to understand the whole organisation on their first morning.

There is also a problem with how success is described. Volunteering can build confidence, whereas the volunteering required for a particular project may involve repetitive work that offers little choice. Treating all participation as equally rewarding overlooks that difference.

The coordinator now reports active shifts, completed tasks and reasons for leaving alongside registration numbers. Some trustees find the new report less impressive because it contains fewer large totals. However, a smaller accurate picture is more useful for planning than a large uncertain one. The centre needs reliable information about participation, not a list that merely looks busy.

Listening · What Does 'Everyone Agrees' Mean?

Editor: Your article says everyone in the building supports the new roof garden. How did you establish that?
Reporter: The residents' meeting approved it, and nobody there objected.
Editor: How many flats were represented?
Reporter: Twelve out of thirty. The meeting was on a weekday afternoon.
Editor: Then the support at that meeting is clear, but the opinion of the whole building isn't. Some residents may have been working.
Reporter: I can change it to 'Residents at the meeting supported the proposal.'
Editor: Good. Also, the collection of comments is interesting, but it isn't a survey with a representative sample.
Reporter: Should I remove the positive quotations?
Editor: No. Keep them and explain their source. Enthusiasm is part of the story. The problem is making the evidence carry a claim it cannot support.
Reporter: One resident said the garden would transform the building.
Editor: That is a prediction. Attribute it clearly rather than presenting it as an established result.
Reporter: Understood. I'll ask management whether a second consultation is planned.
Editor: Excellent. Accuracy doesn't require a lifeless article. It requires readers to distinguish what happened, what people hope, and what remains unknown. Those differences are often more interesting than a headline claiming universal agreement.

Hi Sara,
The centre's new introductory shifts sound useful. Everyone gets a clear first task, so joining should feel less confusing. I'm going on Saturday to see whether the library role suits me. Would you come too? A huge volunteer list means little if nobody knows where to start.
Best,
Lola

Reading · An Old Chair in a New Exhibition

A small regional museum has received a beautiful old wooden chair from a local school. At first, the donation seemed unremarkable. The museum already owns several chairs, and visitors rarely travel across town simply to inspect another seat. The accompanying papers, however, connect this object to evening literacy classes held in the school after normal lessons.

The distinction between an object and its documented history matters. Wood can reveal how furniture was made, while a written account may explain how it was used. Neither source is complete by itself. A polished surface does not prove that a chair belonged to a particular teacher, and a family memory may confuse two similar objects.

The curator plans to display the chair beside copies of attendance records. She will describe the connection as probable rather than certain because one date remains inconsistent. Some donors worry that cautious wording makes the story less attractive. Yet uncertainty can invite visitors to investigate rather than simply admire.

The display will also explain why the classes took place at school, not in a purpose-built adult centre. The institution was available in the evenings, and its familiar setting reduced costs. The chair becomes interesting through that social context, not through an exaggerated claim that it changed history alone.

Listening · Choosing Materials for a Public Notice

Designer: We can print the notice on thick paper or use a small reusable board. Which suits the centre?
Manager: The board costs more initially, but the timetable changes every month. We use a surprising amount of paper already.
Designer: Then a plain white magnetic board may be practical. It won't look as elegant as a framed poster, though.
Manager: Elegance isn't the main issue. People need to read the information from the entrance, including visitors who are unfamiliar with the building.
Designer: Where exactly will it stand?
Manager: In the hall beside reception. Not outside, where rain would damage it, and not behind the desk, where the queue hides it.
Designer: I can bring a sample tomorrow. Would you also like a paper showing the proposed layout?
Manager: Yes, one printed sheet would help the team discuss it. We need evidence about readability before ordering ten boards.
Designer: That distinction matters. A material saving is useful only if the information remains accessible.
Manager: Exactly. I don't want to reduce paper consumption by replacing readable notices with something nobody understands. Let's test one board for a week and ask users to find a particular class time without staff assistance.

Writing namuna — urinishdan keyin

Dear Volunteer Coordinator,
Thank you for introducing short orientation shifts for new members. The arrangement should help applicants understand the work before making a regular commitment, and I would like to attend the next library session.
Could you confirm the starting time and explain whether participants need any previous experience? A brief description of the tasks would also help me prepare appropriately. I am interested in organising materials, but I would prefer guidance before assisting visitors independently.
I suggest providing a simple printed card with the name of an experienced contact person. The card could remain useful after the introductory session, especially for someone who feels uncomfortable interrupting a busy team. Clear information and a welcoming first shift seem more valuable than increasing registration numbers alone.
Yours sincerely,
Lola Akhmedova

Reading · Only the Headline Was Simple

A science centre described its new exhibition as 'absolutely unique' and promised that visitors would be amazed. The opening survey produced a more complicated picture. Many visitors were interested in the demonstrations, but several found the instructions confusing. The exhibition was not necessarily disappointing; the route through it was simply unclear.

One report stated that visitors almost completed every activity. Another said that almost every visitor completed an activity. These sentences sound similar, yet they describe different outcomes. The first concerns how far people progressed; the second concerns how many people participated at all. A small change in adverb position can therefore alter the apparent success of the entire project.

The evaluation team rewrote its summary using specific observations. Most visitors completed at least one activity, while fewer than half reached the final station. Families described the opening demonstration as fascinating, but some were exhausted before finding the quieter area. That evidence suggests a layout problem rather than a complete failure of content.

The centre will improve signs and add seating before buying more equipment. Its next advertisement may sound less dramatic, but the practical changes are more likely to help. Visitors need an engaging experience, not a competition between the strongest adjectives in the dictionary.

Listening · Reading Customer Feedback Carefully

Researcher: The report says customers were completely satisfied with the delivery service. Does the evidence support that wording?
Manager: Most ratings were positive. I thought the stronger phrase made the conclusion clearer.
Researcher: It actually makes it less accurate. Some customers were pleased with the speed but frustrated by damaged packaging.
Manager: So the service was satisfying but the packaging was disappointing?
Researcher: For those respondents, yes. We should distinguish the experience from the people experiencing it. Also, this sentence says we only delivered late to rural addresses.
Manager: I meant that rural addresses were the only places with late deliveries.
Researcher: Then write that directly. 'Only delivered late' can suggest lateness was the only thing we did, which is hardly a recommendation.
Manager: Language is making our vans look worse than they are.
Researcher: Precise language will help them. We can say ninety percent arrived on time, then explain the exceptions and proposed improvements.

Manager: Would that sound defensive?
Researcher: Not if the action is clear. Acknowledging an irritating problem is more convincing than calling everything absolutely perfect. Customers remember the box they received, not the adjective we preferred in a meeting.
Manager: I'll revise the summary and keep the figures beside each claim.

Writing namuna — urinishdan keyin

Advertising often promises an amazing experience, but strong adjectives tell us little without evidence. I am more interested in what a service actually does than in whether a company calls it perfect.
The science exhibition provides a useful example. Visitors enjoyed the demonstrations, yet many struggled to find their way through the building. Calling the whole exhibition disappointing would ignore its strengths. Calling it absolutely wonderful would ignore the layout problem. Specific descriptions reveal what needs to change.
Of course, advertisements are designed to attract attention. Nobody expects a poster to contain an evaluation report. A lively phrase can communicate enthusiasm and help an event reach an audience. The problem begins when excitement replaces evidence or makes a limited benefit sound universal.
I suggest looking for concrete details beside the attractive language. What proportion of deliveries arrive on time? Which activities are included? What happens when a customer has a problem? These questions are more useful than arguing about whether something is truly amazing.
Businesses can benefit from precision. A realistic promise is easier to keep, and an acknowledged weakness gives customers a reason to trust improvement. Clear information may be quieter than a slogan, but it usually lasts longer.

Reading · A Question Is Not an Accusation

At a meeting about a new cycle route, several residents wanted details about deliveries and emergency access. The chair invited questions, but the first speaker asked, 'You have considered local businesses, haven't you?' The wording sounded polite, yet it also suggested that a particular answer was expected. A trader who still had concerns hesitated to respond.

Later, another resident asked, 'Could you explain how deliveries will reach the shops during construction?' That question produced a useful diagram and a clear timetable. It did not assume either competence or failure; it requested information that everyone could examine.

Indirect questions are not automatically neutral, and question tags are not automatically aggressive. Tone, context and the relationship between speakers all matter. However, the structure can influence whether a discussion invites evidence or merely seeks agreement.

The chair decided to collect written questions before the next meeting. This may help quieter residents, although it should not replace opportunities to challenge an unclear answer. The aim is a conversation in which people can ask where access will remain open and whether arrangements have been tested. A public meeting should clarify the proposal, not reward whichever participant can attach the most confident 'isn't it?' to an opinion.

Listening · Enquiring About a Training Grant

Applicant: Could you tell me whether part-time workers can apply for the training grant?
Officer: Yes, they can. The main condition concerns the course, not the number of hours they work.
Applicant: And do you know when decisions will be announced?
Officer: The panel meets on the twelfth. Applicants should receive a message within the following week.
Applicant: The website mentions employer approval. That means my manager must pay part of the fee, doesn't it?
Officer: No. Approval confirms that the proposed training is relevant. It does not create a financial obligation for the employer.
Applicant: I'm glad I checked. Could you explain where supporting documents should be uploaded?
Officer: Use the secure application portal, not ordinary email. There is a separate box for each document.
Applicant: The guidance is quite detailed, isn't it?
Officer: It is, although some applicants find the terminology difficult. We're revising the examples.
Applicant: A sample completed checklist would help me more than another paragraph of definitions.
Officer: That's useful feedback. I can send a blank checklist now. Please remember that checking eligibility does not guarantee funding; the panel still compares applications against the published criteria.
Applicant: Understood. I want to submit a complete application, not assume the outcome before anyone has assessed it.

Reading · Agreement with a Condition

A residents' group is considering a shared garden, but apparent agreement hides different expectations. One member thinks the site should mainly grow vegetables. Another is thinking about a quiet seating area. Both support 'a garden', yet they may be imagining incompatible uses of the same small plot.
At the meeting, someone said, 'We don't need formal rules, do we?' Several people nodded. Later discussion revealed concerns about watering, access and the distribution of produce. Agreement with a general statement had not resolved those practical questions.
The group now distinguishes shared principles from operational decisions. Members value open access, and so does the housing manager. Some residents cannot commit to weekly duties, and neither can the caretaker. Recognising these limits is more useful than treating hesitation as a lack of community spirit.
The proposal includes a trial planting area and a separate bench. It also names a contact person for maintenance problems. This arrangement may seem less ambitious than the original sketch, but it tests whether the group can sustain basic responsibilities before expanding.
Good cooperation does not require everyone to feel equally enthusiastic about every detail. It requires people to know what they agree to, what remains undecided, and how an attractive idea will function after the first planting afternoon.

Listening · Reacting to a Flexible Work Proposal

Colleague: I think the flexible-start proposal could help with travel. I'm thinking about starting half an hour earlier.
Partner: So am I, although I want to check the customer coverage first.
Colleague: We aren't reducing opening hours, are we?
Partner: No. The office keeps the same hours. Individuals choose different starting times within the agreed limits.
Colleague: I don't want clients to find nobody available.
Partner: Neither do I. That's why the manager is asking each team for a coverage plan.
Colleague: The proposal sounds fair, but some roles have less flexibility.
Partner: Yes. I see that problem. I'm seeing the manager tomorrow to discuss how those roles might benefit in another way.
Colleague: Perhaps they could choose preferred break times instead.
Partner: Possibly. We shouldn't call the system equal simply because the same email goes to everyone.
Colleague: You haven't submitted your plan yet, have you?
Partner: No. I want to understand the limits before promising a schedule. Flexibility is useful, but it isn't a substitute for coordination.
Colleague: Agreed. Let's compare our draft times today. If they leave a gap at reception, we'll adjust them before the meeting rather than ask customers to admire our flexibility from a locked doorway.

Writing namuna — urinishdan keyin

Dear Training Grants Officer,
I am writing to clarify the application requirements for your current training grant. I work part-time and understand that this does not prevent me from applying, provided the course meets the published criteria.
Could you confirm whether employer approval only establishes the relevance of the course? I would also appreciate clarification of the final date for uploading supporting documents through the secure portal. The panel meets on the twelfth, but I do not want to confuse that date with the submission deadline.
I am considering a course related to my present role and would like to prepare a complete application. A sample checklist with brief explanations would be particularly useful for applicants unfamiliar with the terminology. It could reduce incomplete submissions without adding another long section to the guidance.
Yours faithfully,
Samira Usmanova

Reading · Editing a Community Report

The first draft of a neighbourhood survey declared that everyone was delighted with the new park. An editor checked the underlying responses and found a more balanced picture. Most respondents liked the planting, but several were concerned about lighting. The collection of comments was valuable; it was not proof of universal satisfaction.

The editor also changed a sentence claiming that the council had only improved the central entrance. The intended meaning was that this entrance was the only area improved, not that improvement was the council's sole activity. Moving one word made the claim easier to understand.

A photograph showed a beautiful new wooden bench, yet the caption called it 'completely comfortable'. Comfort depends partly on the user, so the editor replaced that judgement with dimensions and a description of its back support. The resulting caption was less enthusiastic but more informative.

Before publication, the team asked whether residents could identify which findings were observed and which were interpretations. Several readers requested a simple table. The final report included one, alongside quotations representing different views. Precision did not remove personality from the report. It helped readers see whose experience was being described and where the evidence ended, which is essential when a document may influence the next round of spending.

Listening · Reviewing a Course Advertisement

Coordinator: The draft says our course is perfect for everyone. That sounds welcoming, doesn't it?
Tutor: It does, but it promises too much. Some applicants need an advanced course, while ours introduces basic design skills.
Coordinator: Could you suggest a more accurate description?
Tutor: Say who it is intended for and what participants practise. The list of activities is clear, and each task has a practical outcome.
Coordinator: Nobody needs previous experience, do they?
Tutor: No, but everyone needs access to a suitable device. We should state that beside the booking button.
Coordinator: I'm thinking about adding a sample task. I think that would explain the level better than several adjectives.
Tutor: So do I. Also, the phrase 'only beginners receive feedback' is wrong. All participants receive feedback; beginners are simply our main audience.
Coordinator: Good catch. Do you know whether the sample files are ready?
Tutor: Yes, they are. I have tested them with three volunteers, and two found the first instruction confusing.
Coordinator: Then let's revise it before publishing.
Tutor: Exactly. An inviting advertisement can still be precise. We want learners to arrive with realistic expectations, not spend the first session discovering which parts of 'perfect for everyone' did not include them.

Writing namuna — urinishdan keyin

A useful course advertisement should help a learner make a decision, not merely produce excitement. I would like to see the intended level, the practical requirements and an example of the work before reading that a course is perfect for everyone.
A sample task can communicate difficulty more clearly than a label such as beginner-friendly. It shows the kind of instructions learners will meet and the outcome they are expected to produce. However, one sample should not be presented as a complete picture of the course.
Requirements also need to be visible. If everyone needs a suitable device, that information belongs near the booking button. Hiding it in a long document may lead people to pay for something they cannot access properly.
Finally, the advertisement should explain feedback. Will a tutor respond individually, will peers discuss the work, or will learners compare their answers with a model? These are different experiences, and none should be implied without being provided.
Some people argue that detailed information makes advertising dull. I disagree. Clear examples can be engaging, while realistic promises build trust. A course does not need to suit everybody to be valuable; it needs to serve its actual learners well.

The evening language centre drafted an advertisement saying, 'Everyone becomes confident after six lessons.' A tutor objected that nobody had measured confidence consistently. The previous class had completed a short survey, but only twelve of its twenty learners responded. Most respondents said they felt more willing to speak. That was encouraging, yet it did not establish a result for everyone who enrolled.

The draft also described the classroom as a spacious modern room. In fact, it was a small bright room with a large shared table. Some learners enjoyed the close arrangement; others wanted more personal space for writing. The administrator suggested using a photograph and giving the maximum group size instead of relying on a broad adjective.

The revised advertisement promises opportunities to practise in a group of up to ten. It reports the survey as feedback from twelve respondents and avoids claiming that all future learners will have the same experience. Precise wording may sound less dramatic, but it helps applicants decide whether the course fits their needs. Accuracy does not require hiding positive feedback; it requires describing whose feedback it is.

The tutor proposes a further check before publication. Two people unfamiliar with the centre will read the revised advertisement and explain what they think it promises. One may interpret 'up to ten' as a guarantee that ten learners will always attend; another may assume that a practice opportunity means individual correction after every sentence. Their interpretations will help the centre identify remaining ambiguity.

The centre will also explain what it can verify about progress. Tutors keep examples of learners' spoken and written work, but the examples come from different tasks and involve different amounts of support. They cannot be combined into a fair comparison merely because each page has a date. The tutor wants the advertisement to link to a description of the teaching approach rather than to an unsupported ranking of past learners.

A donor offers to pay for a more dramatic headline. The administrator thanks her but keeps the narrower wording. More enquiries would be welcome only if prospective learners understand the service. The centre plans to record common questions from applicants and compare them with later feedback. If the same misunderstanding appears before and after enrolment, the description will need another revision, even if the enrolment numbers initially look impressive.

Reading · Keeping a Library Open During Repairs

Next month, builders will be replacing the library roof, but the building will not close completely. Staff will be serving readers from the ground-floor rooms, and a temporary desk will be operating beside the side entrance. The upstairs study area will not be receiving visitors during the work.
The manager argues that partial access is better than a full closure. Students will still be collecting reserved books, and families will be attending a reduced programme of activities. However, readers who depend on a quiet workspace may gain little from a noisy ground floor. Calling the library open should not imply that every usual service remains available.
The published timetable therefore identifies both operating hours and likely periods of noise. Contractors will be carrying materials through the courtyard before ten, while delivery vehicles will be using a separate gate. Volunteers will not be directing visitors through the work area.
Some members want a guarantee that the timetable will never change. The manager cannot reasonably provide that, since hidden damage may affect the schedule. Instead, a daily notice will explain any revision and offer alternative study locations. The plan treats continuity as a practical effort to preserve access, not as a promise that repairs can occur without anyone noticing.

Listening · A Station During Platform Works

Presenter: What will passengers notice during the station improvements?
Planner: For the next fortnight, workers will be extending platform two. Trains will be using platforms one and three, and staff will be helping passengers at the main entrance.
Presenter: Some commuters worry that the temporary arrangement will be confusing.
Planner: It may be unfamiliar, so we will be displaying the same colour-coded information online and inside the station. We won't be relying only on announcements, which some passengers cannot hear clearly.
Presenter: Will the cafe area become a waiting room?
Planner: Part of it will. The cafe will still be serving customers, but half the seats will be available without a purchase.
Presenter: That detail matters. People may otherwise assume they need to buy something.
Planner: Exactly. The signs will state it plainly. We also won't be sending wheelchair users along the narrow temporary footbridge; an accessible route is available beside the entrance.
Presenter: Can you promise the works will feel effortless?
Planner: No. Transfers may take longer. We can promise clear information and staff assistance, not pretend construction is invisible.
Presenter: That sounds less dramatic than 'business as usual'.
Planner: It is more useful. A realistic explanation helps people plan, whereas a reassuring slogan may leave them surprised at the platform.

Reading · Preparing a Small Archive for Opening

The local history archive will welcome its first visitors in June. By opening day, the team will have catalogued the donated photographs and installed protective covers on the most fragile documents. During the opening week, volunteers will be demonstrating the search system rather than offering unrestricted access to every box.

What will researchers be doing while the final records are checked? They will be using a temporary index and requesting material through staff. This may seem slow, but an incomplete catalogue can cause greater delays if visitors expect everything to be immediately available.

The director has separated physical readiness from intellectual completeness. By June, the reading room will have passed its safety inspection, yet interpretation of some documents will continue for months. A collection can be accessible before every historical question has been answered.

Some supporters want the opening announcement to say the archive is finished. The team prefers 'ready for a first stage of public use'. That wording acknowledges progress without disguising the work ahead. It also encourages families to contribute missing names and dates. The public opening is therefore a milestone in an ongoing process, not a ribbon-cutting ceremony that magically turns every uncertain photograph into a fully explained piece of history.

Listening · Checking the Festival Schedule

Coordinator: What will the technical team be doing at nine on opening morning?
Engineer: We'll be testing the microphones. By then, we will have installed the main speakers, but the sound check needs an empty square.
Coordinator: Will stallholders be unloading at the same time?
Engineer: Not in the central area. They will have completed those deliveries by eight thirty under the current plan.

Coordinator: One trader has requested a later slot because his driver covers another route first.
Engineer: We can discuss a side entrance. The deadline exists to keep vehicles away from the sound cables, not to punish someone for asking.
Coordinator: That's helpful. Will you be available for small changes during the programme?
Engineer: One technician will be monitoring the stage all day. The others will be working on the indoor sessions.
Coordinator: By noon, we will have welcomed several hundred visitors, so the information desk needs a clear contact list.
Engineer: Agreed. Please distinguish urgent faults from ordinary requests. A broken microphone needs immediate action; a speaker wanting slightly more dramatic entrance music can wait.
Coordinator: I'll make that distinction in the briefing.
Engineer: Good. A timetable should coordinate different jobs, not make every request look equally urgent simply because it arrives during a busy morning.

Writing namuna — urinishdan keyin

Dear Library Manager,
Thank you for explaining how services will continue during the roof repairs. I appreciate that staff will be lending reserved books downstairs rather than closing the building entirely.
However, I normally use the upstairs study room to prepare for examinations. Could you confirm which periods are likely to be particularly noisy and whether an alternative quiet room will be available nearby? A list of suitable locations would help students plan before the work begins.
By the start of the repairs, many readers will have arranged their study schedules, so early information would be valuable. I also suggest placing the daily update beside the reservation desk as well as online. This would support visitors who do not regularly check the website and reduce repeated questions for staff.
Yours sincerely,
Dina Rustamova

Reading · A Deadline That Does Not Mean Completion

A town has promised to publish an online map of accessible public buildings by September. Will the survey team have visited every site by then? No. The current schedule covers sixty of the ninety buildings, and the remaining inspections require additional funding. The first release will therefore be useful but incomplete.

The project manager wants unvisited sites marked as 'not yet assessed', rather than left blank. A blank space could suggest either that no barrier exists or that the building has been forgotten. Neither interpretation would be reliable. By September, the team will not have verified information supplied informally by every building owner.

Some councillors fear that visible gaps will make the project look unsuccessful. Disability advocates disagree: knowing where information is missing is itself valuable. They also want the map to distinguish a step-free entrance from full access throughout a building. One positive feature does not answer every visitor's question.

The deadline should produce a transparent first version, not an appearance of completeness. Later updates can add verified detail and record changes. A map that admits its limits helps users plan; a polished map that hides them may send someone to a destination they cannot actually enter or use comfortably.

Listening · Before the Product Demonstration

Client: Will your team have finished the booking system by Friday's demonstration?
Developer: We will have completed the calendar and confirmation messages, but we won't have tested the payment function thoroughly enough for public use.
Client: The invitation says people can try the new service.
Developer: They can try a demonstration with sample bookings. We need to distinguish that from accepting real payments.
Client: Will the security review have been completed?
Developer: Not by Friday. The external reviewer starts next week. I don't want a confident presentation to suggest checks have happened when they haven't.
Client: Could we hide the payment button and explain the limited scope at the beginning?
Developer: Yes. That would make the session useful without misleading participants. We can ask them about navigation and the clarity of messages.
Client: Some guests may be disappointed.
Developer: Possibly, but discovering a limit during a demonstration is better than discovering it after someone has paid. Their feedback can still improve the system.
Client: Then I'll revise the invitation today.
Developer: Thank you. A deadline can define what we are ready to show; it should not pressure us into calling unfinished work complete. The most valuable outcome on Friday may be a clear list of improvements rather than immediate applause.

Speaking

Xaritani muddatida qisman nashr qilish tarafdori yoki qarshisi bo‘ling; noma’lum ma’lumotni qanday belgilang? 2 daqiqa fikr bildiring, keyin sherikning qarshi savoliga 30 soniyada javob bering.

Mezon: Will…have + V3 savoli va won't have + V3 cheklovlarini aniq muddat bilan qo‘llaydi. · Matndan ikki dalil keltiradi, bir qarshi fikrni tan olib javob beradi. · Belgilangan vaqtni saqlab, bugungi grammatikadan kamida ikki aniq misol ishlatadi.

Writing

Texnologiya forumi uchun 'To‘liq tugamagan xizmatni namoyish qilish mumkinmi?' mavzusida post yozing. Foyda, xavf va halol chegaralash shartlarini muhokama qiling. 180–200 so‘z yozing.

Mezon: Demo va real foydalanishni ajratib, kamida ikki oshkoralik shartini beradi. · Qabul qiluvchi va janrga mos murojaat/uslubni saqlab, fikrlarni mantiqan bog‘laydi. · 180–200 so‘z chegarasini saqlaydi; maqsadli grammatikani kamida ikki marta aniq qo‘llaydi.

Writing namuna — urinishdan keyin

A service does not always need to be complete before people can give feedback. I support demonstrations of unfinished work, provided the limits are visible and nobody mistakes a trial for a tested product.
The booking system illustrates this. Visitors can comment on the calendar and confirmation messages even though payment testing is incomplete. Their reactions may reveal confusion before the developers invest time in the wrong design.
However, the invitation must explain what participants can actually do. If it promises a new service without qualification, people may reasonably expect real transactions. Hiding an unfinished button is helpful, but an explanation at the start is also necessary. Sample bookings should be clearly labelled, and no claim should imply that an external security review has already happened.
Some organisers worry that these limits will make the event disappointing. That is possible, yet disappointment is less damaging than misplaced trust. By the demonstration date, the team may not have completed every feature, but it can still have prepared focused questions and a feedback process.
I would judge the event by what the team learns and communicates, not by applause alone. A useful demonstration makes the next version better while keeping promises realistic.

Reading · The Training Programme's Halfway Review

A workplace training programme has reached its planning stage, and the organisers are defining what learners can reasonably achieve. What will participants have produced by the halfway review? Each will have completed one small project and received written feedback. They will not be expected to master every tool in the software.

Will tutors be observing practice during the review week? Yes, they will. The observations are intended to reveal where instructions need improvement, not merely to identify individual mistakes. If several people struggle at the same step, the course design may be part of the problem.

The programme manager has resisted a suggestion to count logins as the main measure of engagement. A login shows access, but it cannot establish understanding. Equally, a learner who studies downloaded materials may appear inactive on the platform while working carefully offline.

The review will therefore combine project evidence, brief learner explanations and tutor observations. By the final meeting, the team will have compared these sources and identified changes for the next group. This approach requires more judgement than a simple activity chart, but it avoids treating visible clicks as learning itself. The aim is demonstrable progress, including an honest account of what learners still need to practise.

Listening · Questions Before a Street Survey

Resident: What will your team have checked by the public meeting?
Researcher: We will have counted traffic at six locations and compared morning and evening conditions.
Resident: Will you be interviewing people outside the shops too?
Researcher: Yes, we will. We also plan telephone conversations with residents who cannot attend in person.
Resident: Will you have solved the parking problem by then?
Researcher: No, we won't. The meeting is for presenting evidence and discussing options, not announcing a completed design.
Resident: What will you have learned about deliveries?
Researcher: We expect to have recorded their usual times and the space they need. We should then be able to distinguish regular requirements from occasional exceptions.
Resident: Some neighbours think the decision has already been made.
Researcher: Then we need to explain the process more clearly. Questions should influence the options, not simply decorate a finished proposal.
Resident: Will you be publishing the raw counts?
Researcher: Yes, we will, with notes explaining when and where they were collected. A number without context can create another argument rather than settle one.
Resident: That would help. I may disagree with the recommendation, but I want to see how you reached it before deciding whether the evidence supports it.

Hi Omar,
By the review, we'll have finished one small project, not mastered every tool. That feels manageable. Will you be practising on Tuesday? I will, and we could compare our explanations afterwards. I'll ask the tutor how offline work is recorded so our effort doesn't disappear from the chart.
Best,
Zebo

Reading · The Launch That Changed Shape

The team was going to launch a complete neighbourhood history website in May. Volunteers believed they would have enough time to translate every interview before publication. By April, however, several recordings still lacked permission for public use, and translation was taking longer than expected.

The revised plan separates a first release from the complete collection. By launch day, the team will have checked permissions for twenty interviews and prepared summaries in two languages. During the first month, translators will be working on longer transcripts while editors collect corrections from families.

Some volunteers feel the smaller release breaks the original promise. Others argue that publishing unapproved material would be a more serious failure. The coordinator has acknowledged the earlier overconfidence and explained why the timetable changed. This does not erase the disappointment, but it makes the decision open to scrutiny.

By the time the full collection appears, the team hopes to have improved both its records and its process for obtaining consent. Meanwhile, the website will clearly identify which material is available and which is still being prepared. A changed plan is not automatically evidence of poor commitment. Sometimes it shows that new information has been taken seriously rather than forced into an unrealistic deadline.

Listening · A Sports Centre's Revised Opening

Reporter: You were going to reopen the sports centre this weekend. What changed?
Manager: The inspection found a drainage problem near the changing rooms. We had expected the final checks to be straightforward, but the repair needs another week.
Reporter: What will users be able to do meanwhile?
Manager: Outdoor classes will be running as scheduled. By Monday, we will have moved the booked indoor sessions to two partner venues.
Reporter: Will every user receive the same arrangement?
Manager: No. Swimming sessions cannot transfer to a hall, so those bookings will be refunded. We need to explain the differences clearly.
Reporter: Some members say you promised the building would be ready.
Manager: We did announce a date, and we should have made the remaining inspection condition clearer. I understand their frustration.
Reporter: By the time the centre opens, will the drainage work have been checked again?
Manager: Yes. During that check, contractors will still be finishing minor decoration elsewhere, but public routes will be complete.
Reporter: So some work may continue after opening?
Manager: Only outside user areas. We will publish the details rather than call everything finished. People need to know what affects their visit, not receive another broad assurance that later needs a footnote.

Writing namuna — urinishdan keyin

Dear Programme Manager,
Thank you for clarifying the expectations for the halfway review. I understand that each participant will have completed one small project and received written feedback by that stage, while tutors will be observing our practice during the review week.
Could you explain how work completed offline will be considered? I regularly use downloaded materials, so my login record may not reflect the time spent studying. I can provide drafts and a brief explanation of the decisions made in my project.
I was going to focus mainly on the platform activity chart, but your message has helped me understand the wider evidence required. I suggest allowing every learner to submit a short process note alongside the finished work. This would make progress visible without treating online activity as the only sign of engagement.
Yours sincerely,
Zebo Nurmatova

Reading · Planning the Final Month of a Pilot

A community transport pilot is approaching its final month. At the beginning, organisers thought they would be ready to recommend a permanent service by this point. In practice, two unusual festival weekends produced demand that may not represent ordinary travel patterns. The evaluation needs to separate those peaks from routine use.
During the final month, drivers will be recording missed requests as well as completed journeys. By the last review meeting, analysts will have compared weekdays, weekends and special events. They will not have enough evidence to predict every seasonal change, and the report should state that limitation.
Supporters argue that the service already helps people without cars. Critics question whether its cost is sustainable. Both issues matter, so a single count of passengers will not settle the debate. The team also needs information about journey purpose, alternative transport and the consequences of an unavailable ride.
By the time a decision is made, residents should have access to the findings and a chance to challenge the interpretation. The pilot was intended to inform a choice, not make that choice inevitable. Continuing, revising or ending it could each be reasonable, depending on the evidence. A useful evaluation explains the conditions behind its recommendation rather than treating activity itself as proof of success.

Listening · The Final Exhibition Briefing

Curator: By Thursday evening, we will have installed all the objects in the main gallery. On Friday morning, staff will be testing lighting and visitor routes.
Director: Will the audio guides have been checked by then?
Curator: Yes, but we won't have translated the additional interviews. Those will follow next month, as the updated notice explains.
Director: We were going to include them at opening. Are visitors likely to feel misled?
Curator: They might if we kept the original wording. We have changed the website and contacted booked groups. The main exhibition is complete; the supplementary material is a later addition.
Director: What will volunteers be doing during the first weekend?
Curator: They will be noting repeated questions and places where people hesitate. That feedback may reveal unclear labels.
Director: Good. By the time we review the opening, I want more than attendance figures.
Curator: We will have collected comments from visitors and staff, including people who leave early. Their experience matters too.
Director: Then let's state the distinction between completed installation and continuing improvement in the briefing.
Curator: Agreed. Opening the doors marks readiness to welcome people, not the end of learning about how they use the space. A gallery can be carefully prepared and still benefit from its first audience.

Writing namuna — urinishdan keyin

A busy pilot project is not automatically a successful one. Before deciding whether a service should continue, we need to ask what it was intended to achieve and whether the evidence answers that question.
The community transport trial shows the problem. Festival weekends attracted many passengers, but those peaks may not represent normal demand. By the final review, the team should have compared ordinary days with special events rather than combining everything into one encouraging total.
Missed requests matter too. Completed journeys show what the service provided, whereas unavailable rides reveal needs it could not meet. Information about alternative transport would also help explain how much difference the pilot made to people's lives.
Of course, collecting evidence costs time and money. We cannot postpone every decision until every uncertainty disappears. Nevertheless, a report can acknowledge limits while still offering a practical recommendation. It might support a smaller route, different operating hours or a further seasonal test.
I would call the evaluation successful if residents can understand why the recommendation follows from the findings. Continuing the service is not the only acceptable result. A well-explained revision may serve the community better than keeping an impressive but unsuitable project unchanged.

Before the Reading Festival Opens

120 daqiqalik uy vazifasining reading/listening qismi: 35 daqiqa; qo‘shimcha vaqt emas. 3 daqiqa taxmin; 12 daqiqa uzluksiz o‘qish; 15 daqiqa olti javob va dalil; 5 daqiqa tekshirish va bitta javobni yaxshilash.

The reading festival opens on Saturday at ten. By Friday evening, the volunteers will have arranged the chairs and checked the public routes. At nine on Saturday, two librarians will be explaining the booking system while another volunteer welcomes authors at the station. The organisers were going to print a programme for every visitor, but several sessions have changed. They will instead display a dated programme at each entrance and offer a short printed version on request.

One organiser has suggested announcing that every session will start exactly on time. The coordinator refuses: visiting authors may be delayed, and a promise cannot remove that uncertainty. She prefers to state how changes will be communicated. A volunteer will update the entrance boards and explain alternatives if a session moves.

By the end of the festival, the team will have collected attendance figures and a record of changes. During the final meeting, they will be comparing the two. A full room may show popularity, but the change record may explain why another room was unexpectedly empty. Looking at both will make next year's planning more useful.

The team will rehearse the update procedure on Friday. One volunteer will pretend that an author is delayed, and another will follow the signs as if arriving for the first time. The exercise will test whether the website, entrance boards and spoken explanation agree. It will not predict every possible delay, but it can expose a contradiction while there is still time to fix it.

The coordinator has also reserved a small quiet room. It is intended for visitors who need a break, not as an unannounced substitute for a cancelled session. If it is used for another purpose, that change must be explained. Otherwise a solution for one group could remove a facility another group was relying on.

Afterwards, volunteers will separate events they observed from explanations they inferred. For example, seeing people leave a queue does not establish that they disliked the author. They may have been following a changed room notice or collecting a child. The review will combine the observation log with short visitor comments. Organisers will describe uncertain explanations as possibilities, while using confirmed problems to assign practical actions. The next festival should benefit from the record rather than simply inherit a confident sentence saying that this year's event went well.

Reading · A Job Title Is Not a Job Description

A youth organisation is recruiting a communications assistant. Its first advertisement describes the ideal applicant as creative, confident and flexible. Those adjectives sound positive, but they leave practical questions unanswered. Does flexible mean willing to change working hours, able to use different software, or comfortable switching between tasks? An attractive label is not an observable responsibility.

The revised advertisement states what the assistant does: writes short updates, checks information with colleagues and prepares accessible event notices. It also distinguishes essential skills from skills that can be learned after appointment. The successful applicant is a member of a team, not an independent expert in every form of communication.

Some staff worry that concrete descriptions will attract people who lack ambition. The recruitment lead disagrees. Clear verbs give applicants a better basis for judging their experience, while broad adjectives may reward confidence more than ability. Someone can be a careful writer without being the loudest person in an interview.

The team will still discuss attitude and willingness to learn. However, it will ask for examples rather than accept self-description alone. The change does not make personality irrelevant. It prevents a handful of fashionable words from standing in for the actual work and helps both applicants and interviewers understand what a fair assessment should examine.

Listening · What Does a 'Quiet Workspace' Mean?

Member: Your shared office is advertised as a quiet workspace. Is that a rule or just a description of the atmosphere?
Host: It's a description, but I see why the distinction matters. People work here, and short conversations are normal.
Member: I edit audio, so quiet has a fairly specific meaning for me. Yesterday two people held a video meeting at the next desk.
Host: The meeting booths are usually available, but one was out of service. The advertisement doesn't explain that temporary limitation.
Member: I don't expect complete silence everywhere. I need to know where focused work is possible and which activities belong in the common area.
Host: We could replace the general claim with separate descriptions of each zone. The rear room is a silent work area. The central tables are a collaborative space, and calls belong in the booths.
Member: That would help. A place can be welcoming without being suitable for every task.
Host: Agreed. I'll add the booth status to the booking page as well. I don't want the word quiet to carry a promise the room cannot consistently meet.
Member: Thank you. I'm happy to use the rear room if the expectations are clear. My headphones are useful, but they aren't a substitute for accurate information.

Reading · When a Bag Becomes Evidence

A railway station's lost-property office receives hundreds of objects each month. Staff can identify a suitcase more easily when its owner provides distinctive details than when the owner simply calls it expensive. A description such as 'a small black bag with a broken silver zip' gives useful evidence; a claim about value does not establish ownership.
The office has changed its online form to reflect this. Applicants first name an item, then describe the item with specific features. They are asked about contents without being shown every detail in the public listing. That protects against someone claiming a bag after reading its complete inventory online.
Some passengers find the questions excessive, particularly when they are already anxious. Staff therefore explain why a piece of information matters instead of requesting more information indefinitely. The aim is enough evidence to make a reasonable match, not an impossible test of memory.
The system also distinguishes a passenger's property from equipment belonging to the station. Umbrellas, for example, may look identical but carry different ownership marks. A clear record helps staff return the right object without assuming that the most confident claimant is the rightful owner. In this setting, articles, plurals and possessive forms are small language choices with practical consequences.

Listening · Ordering Supplies Without Confusion

Assistant: The workshop order says we need paper, two papers and six glass containers. I think someone combined several notes.
Coordinator: You're right. We need a pack of drawing paper and two copies of the safety document. 'Two papers' is ambiguous here.
Assistant: And are the containers made of glass, or do you mean six drinking glasses?
Coordinator: Six glass jars for storing brushes. They need wide openings, not handles.
Assistant: I'll write that clearly. The supplier's assistant asked whether the teachers' materials should be packed separately from the students' materials.
Coordinator: Yes. The teachers' box contains demonstration tools. Each student's pack contains a notebook and a pencil, but no cutting equipment.
Assistant: Some people might say these details are obvious.
Coordinator: They are obvious to us because we discussed the session. The person packing the order only sees the words. A small grammatical ambiguity can become a large box of the wrong things.
Assistant: Then I'll send a numbered list with quantities and a short purpose for each item.
Coordinator: Good. Ask for confirmation before dispatch. Precise wording is not unnecessary formality when somebody else must turn a message into physical objects. It saves both their time and ours, and prevents the brushes from arriving with perfectly attractive but entirely unsuitable drinking glasses.

Writing namuna — urinishdan keyin

Dear Workspace Manager,
Thank you for proposing clearer descriptions of the office's different work areas. During my recent visit, a video meeting at the neighbouring desk made audio editing difficult. I understand that one of the meeting booths was unavailable, but that information was not visible when I booked.
The distinction between a silent rear room and a collaborative central area would help members choose an appropriate space. Could you also display the number of working booths on the booking page and indicate where calls should take place when a booth is closed?
I do not expect silence throughout the building. My concern is that the description should match the service available on the day. Clear information about the rooms and their uses would support both focused work and necessary conversation.
Yours sincerely,
Nodir Aliyev

Reading · Whose Design Is It?

A college team has produced a poster for a community event. One student collected photographs, another developed the layout, and a third checked the text. When the poster appeared online, the caption named only the person who uploaded it. The others felt that their work had become invisible.
There is no simple rule that every contribution deserves identical credit. Choosing a font and spending several days editing photographs are different tasks. However, there is a clear reason to describe contributions accurately rather than allow the final uploader's name to stand for everyone. The team has a shared folder, but shared access does not settle authorship.
The students now keep a short contribution record. Each person describes their own work, and the group checks the descriptions together. This helps them notice both visible design work and less visible tasks such as obtaining permission to use an image.
Some classmates worry that recording contributions encourages competition. It could, if the record became a scoreboard. Used carefully, it does the opposite: it gives members language for recognising each other's work. The final caption now names the team and links to a brief account of responsibilities. Nobody needs to claim the whole poster in order to receive fair acknowledgement for a meaningful part of it.

Listening · Sharing a Workshop Kit

Organiser: There are three tool kits in the cupboard, but only one of them belongs to our project. The other two are the college's.
Volunteer: Which one is ours?
Organiser: The blue one with a numbered label. It has a complete list inside the lid.
Volunteer: Someone has taken a screwdriver from the red kit. I assumed everything here was available to everyone.
Organiser: That's an understandable assumption, but shared storage isn't the same as shared ownership. We need to return it and explain the mix-up.
Volunteer: Do we have enough equipment for Saturday without borrowing theirs?
Organiser: We have most of what we need. There isn't a long extension cable in our kit, so I'll request one formally.
Volunteer: Could we label the shelves as well as the boxes? Nobody should have to remember this conversation to find the right equipment.
Organiser: Good suggestion. Each project can have its own marked space, with a separate area for items everyone may borrow.
Volunteer: That would also help new volunteers avoid feeling blamed for unclear instructions.
Organiser: Exactly. Clear boundaries protect cooperation. They aren't a sign that we distrust each other; they prevent an innocent assumption from becoming a missing tool and an unnecessary argument between two otherwise helpful teams.

Writing namuna — urinishdan keyin

Equal recognition sounds fair, but group members do not always contribute in the same way. I would name the team as a whole and then describe responsibilities where that information is useful.
The poster example shows why. The student who uploaded the finished design received credit, although others supplied photographs, arranged the layout and checked the text. Uploading was necessary, but it did not represent the entire project. A caption naming only the uploader gave readers a misleading picture.
A contribution record could help, provided it is not used as a competitive scorecard. Some essential work is difficult to measure. Obtaining permission for an image may take several messages but leave no visible mark on the poster. Counting only obvious design changes would overlook that effort.
I suggest agreeing on credit before publication. Each member can describe their work, and the group can check the wording together. If responsibilities overlap, the description can say so rather than force a false division.
Critics may argue that this creates unnecessary administration. For a very small task, a shared team credit may be enough. However, when a project affects portfolios or public recognition, a short, accurate explanation is worth the effort.

Reading · A Kitchen Changes Its Routine

A community kitchen serves lunch four days a week. Volunteers usually estimate portions from previous attendance, but this month they are weighing leftovers to understand how much food is wasted. The coordinator stresses that the exercise examines the system, not the generosity of individual cooks.
The new instructions are brief: record the number of meals, weigh unused food separately from unavoidable scraps, and note unusual circumstances. Do not change portion sizes merely to make the figures look better. A lower waste total means little if visitors leave hungry.
One volunteer questions whether the measurements create extra work without changing decisions. That concern is reasonable. The kitchen already has a busy routine, and collecting data is not an achievement by itself. The coordinator has therefore identified a specific decision: whether smaller initial servings, with easy second helpings, reduce waste while meeting visitors' needs.
During the trial, staff are also asking whether people feel comfortable requesting more. Some may avoid doing so because they do not want to appear demanding. The team will compare the numbers with those comments before adjusting the routine permanently. Let's measure what matters, the coordinator says, rather than encourage everyone to celebrate a tidy spreadsheet while the actual lunch becomes less satisfying.

Listening · Temporary Checks at a Bicycle Hire Desk

Supervisor: We normally inspect returned bicycles at the end of each hour. This week, we're checking the brakes immediately because several riders reported a problem with one batch.
Assistant: Does that mean every bicycle is unsafe?
Supervisor: No. It means we are investigating a specific pattern. Please explain that accurately instead of alarming customers or dismissing their concerns.
Assistant: What should I record?
Supervisor: Write the bicycle number and the rider's description. Don't diagnose the fault yourself. Ask the technician to inspect it, and keep it out of circulation until that check is complete.
Assistant: Some customers are asking whether they can use another bicycle straight away.
Supervisor: Yes, if a checked one is available. We don't need to stop the whole service while we examine a small group, but we do need to trace those bicycles carefully.
Assistant: Let's put the temporary procedure beside the ordinary return checklist.
Supervisor: Good idea. Mark it with this week's date so nobody mistakes it for a permanent change.
Assistant: Then new staff can see what usually happens and what we are doing differently now.
Supervisor: Exactly. A temporary response works best when its purpose and limits are clear. Otherwise, yesterday's emergency note can quietly become next year's unexplained rule.

Writing namuna — urinishdan keyin

Hi Umid,
The kitchen is weighing leftovers this month. I think the trial could help, but smaller portions shouldn't leave people hungry. We usually count meals; now we also need visitors' comments. I'll help record feedback on Friday and ask whether everyone feels comfortable requesting more food.
See you,
Saida

Reading · The Delivery Map Needs Better Questions

A small bookshop is reviewing its local delivery route. Orders are increasing, and the owner believes the driver is spending too long between stops. The driver disagrees: the route crosses a busy market street, and access changes during unloading hours. A map showing distance alone cannot explain the delay.

The review begins with better questions. Who prepares the parcels before departure? Which entrance does each building use? How long does the driver wait outside locked courtyards? These questions examine the process rather than assume that the person driving is inefficient.

For one week, the driver is recording arrival times and waiting reasons. The shop assistant is checking addresses before parcels leave the store. Early notes reveal that several customers give the main street address although deliveries enter through a side lane behind the building. Clear directions may save more time than a shorter line on the map.

The owner still needs to control costs, and the records do not prove that every delay is unavoidable. However, they make the discussion more specific. A useful route review considers where people move, when access is possible and how instructions are communicated. It does not treat the fastest theoretical journey as a fair measure of somebody's actual working day.

Listening · A Visitor Information Desk Reviews Its Signs

Coordinator: Why are people still asking how to reach the workshop room? There are signs at the entrance.
Volunteer: They're asking where to turn after the stairs, not how to enter the building. The sign near the landing points across the corridor, but the room is behind a fire door.
Coordinator: Who checks that door during events?
Volunteer: The caretaker. It stays closed, and visitors assume the area beyond it is private.
Coordinator: How many people have asked this morning?
Volunteer: Seven. I walked the route with two of them and noticed that the room number disappears from view after the first corner.
Coordinator: So we need another sign on the landing?
Volunteer: Yes, and clearer wording about passing through the door. We should check that the directions match the building's access arrangements before putting anything up.
Coordinator: The original signs look professional.
Volunteer: They do, but appearance doesn't tell us whether people can follow them. Visitors are moving through an unfamiliar space while carrying bags and looking for the right session.
Coordinator: Let's test the revised route with someone who hasn't seen the plan.
Volunteer: Good. If they reach the room independently, we'll have stronger evidence than our own feeling that the arrows are obvious. Familiarity makes many confusing routes look simple to the people who designed them.

Writing namuna — urinishdan keyin

Dear Kitchen Coordinator,
Thank you for explaining the current waste-measurement trial. I support collecting better evidence before changing the normal serving routine, and I can help record visitors' comments on Friday.
Could we ask both whether the initial portion is sufficient and whether people feel comfortable requesting more? The amount of leftover food is useful information, but it may not reveal whether a visitor leaves hungry or avoids asking for a second helping.
I also suggest recording unusual attendance alongside the daily figures. How many meals are served, and how much unused food remains after each session? Comparing similar days would make the results easier to interpret. Clear instructions should distinguish unavoidable scraps from food that could have been eaten, so volunteers record the same categories consistently.
Yours sincerely,
Saida Rahimova

Reading · Reading an Accommodation Review Carefully

An accommodation listing describes a guesthouse as central, peaceful and suitable for everyone. Recent reviews seem contradictory. One visitor calls the location excellent because the market is nearby. Another complains about early deliveries in the same street. Both accounts may be accurate: a convenient location can also be noisy at particular times.
A careful reader distinguishes a general description from a specific experience. 'The rooms are quiet' is broader than 'My room was quiet on a Sunday night.' Similarly, there is a lift does not establish that every entrance or bathroom is accessible. Small grammatical choices affect how much a claim appears to cover.
The owner is updating the listing with room positions, entrance details and typical delivery hours. Some colleagues fear that mentioning limitations will discourage bookings. Yet visitors who need silence or step-free access benefit from accurate information before paying, and unsuitable bookings create complaints later.
Reviews also need context. A family, a business traveller and someone attending a nearby event may judge the same feature differently. The best response is not to label one reviewer unreasonable, but to ask what the person needed and what the property actually provided. Clear descriptions support a better match between guests and accommodation, even when they produce fewer but more suitable reservations.

Listening · A Borrowing Service Explains Its Offer

Interviewer: Your centre lends equipment to local groups. What does a borrower actually receive?
Coordinator: Each booking includes a listed set of items and basic operating instructions. It doesn't include a technician at the event unless the group arranges that separately.
Interviewer: Is that distinction clear on the website?
Coordinator: It is clearer now. We used to describe the service as complete event support, which suggested more than we provide.
Interviewer: What is changing during the current review?
Coordinator: We are checking the lists inside every box and asking borrowers which instructions they find unclear. There are also new labels showing whose equipment each box contains.
Interviewer: Do people object to the more detailed conditions?
Coordinator: Some do, but most appreciate knowing what is available. For example, a projector has a power cable, but it may not have the adapter a particular laptop needs.
Interviewer: How do you help them identify that before collection?
Coordinator: We ask which device they use and send a photograph of the connection. We don't assume everyone knows the technical name.
Interviewer: So clear information is part of the service itself?
Coordinator: Exactly. A box full of useful objects is not useful to someone who cannot connect them. Accurate descriptions, practical questions and understandable instructions are as important as the inventory.

Writing namuna — urinishdan keyin

Contradictory accommodation reviews do not necessarily mean that one visitor is dishonest. People may experience the same place at times or need different things from it. I would read the details before trusting the rating.
A central guesthouse illustrates this well. The nearby market is convenient for one traveller, while early deliveries disturb another. Both comments can be useful. The question is whether that combination suits my own plans, not which reviewer wins the argument.
I also look at the scope of each claim. A quiet room on one Sunday night does not prove that every room is quiet throughout the week. Similarly, a building with a lift may still have steps at its entrance. Specific information matters more than a broad promise that a property suits everyone.
Before booking, I would ask which direction the room faces and when deliveries usually arrive. If access matters, I would request details of the route from the street to the room rather than rely on one general label.
Owners may fear that clear limitations discourage customers. However, accurate descriptions can prevent unsuitable reservations and later complaints. A good match is more valuable than a booking based on expectations the property cannot meet.

A Helpful Host or a Suitable Room?

120 daqiqalik uy vazifasining reading/listening qismi: 35 daqiqa; qo‘shimcha vaqt emas. 3 daqiqa taxmin; 12 daqiqa uzluksiz o‘qish; 15 daqiqa olti javob va dalil; 5 daqiqa tekshirish va bitta javobni yaxshilash.

A review of a guesthouse called its host 'kind and welcoming' and described the room as perfect for study. The first judgement was supported by a specific example: the host brought the visitor an extra blanket and explained the bus route patiently. The second claim needed closer examination. The room contained a chair and a narrow shelf, but no desk. Its window faced a busy courtyard, and deliveries began early.

The reviewer had stayed for one night after a walking trip. A new guest wanted to work there for three weeks. Both travellers could reasonably like the same host while needing different facilities. The booking page now separates information about people from information about the room. It lists furniture, measurements and typical delivery hours, alongside comments about hospitality.

The host was initially disappointed that the revised description sounded less enthusiastic. Later, she noticed that guests asked more precise questions before booking. She cannot guarantee that every visitor will be satisfied, but she can give them a clearer basis for choosing. A positive adjective is not a substitute for the practical detail needed to judge suitability.

To make the description more useful, the host measures the shelf and photographs it with an ordinary notebook on top. She avoids a wide camera angle that would make the surface look deeper. The delivery hours are described as typical, because the bakery next door occasionally changes its schedule. This qualification does not make the information worthless; it tells readers how much certainty they can reasonably expect.

The long-stay guest asks whether a table in the shared lounge can be reserved during working mornings. The host can offer it on four days, but a community group uses the lounge on Wednesdays. They agree to record those details in the booking message. A general promise that a suitable space will be available would conceal the one day when the arrangement fails.

Later, the host compares the questions from business travellers with those from holiday visitors. One group asks about sockets and seating; the other asks about walking routes and breakfast. She keeps both sets of details on the listing rather than deciding that one type of guest is more reasonable. A better match may sometimes mean suggesting another property. Losing an unsuitable booking can prevent disappointment and preserve trust more effectively than winning it with a description that sounds attractive but leaves essential conditions unexplained.

Reading · The Cinema That Stayed Dark

When the Palace cinema closed in 1998, the local newspaper blamed falling interest in films. Twenty years later, a student named Rano examined its surviving accounts for a history project. Ticket sales were lower in the final winter, but summer audiences were almost unchanged. There was no evidence of a steady decline throughout the year.

Rano found a different explanation in letters between the owner and the heating company. The boiler failed in November, and the owner did not pay for a replacement. Several evening performances were cancelled. Customers who arrived at a cold, locked building naturally went elsewhere. The newspaper interviewed the owner but did not speak to the projectionist or the regular audience.

This discovery did not establish that the cinema was financially healthy. The accounts covered ticket income, not the full cost of operating the building. Nevertheless, they challenged the simple story that residents suddenly stopped enjoying films.

For the exhibition, Rano placed the newspaper beside a cancellation notice and a letter about the boiler. Visitors could compare the sources themselves. Her display ended with a question rather than a heroic conclusion: was the closure unavoidable, or did one repair decision make an already difficult winter worse?

Listening · A Gardener Remembers the Flood

Interviewer: People describe the flood of 2006 as the end of the riverside gardens. You worked there. Is that accurate?

Gardener: The water destroyed the seedlings, certainly. There were twelve plots, and none produced a harvest that summer. But the gardens did not disappear immediately. We cleared the paths in September and planted beans the following spring.

Interviewer: Why do the photographs show only empty ground?

Gardener: Most were taken just after the flood. Photographers did not return when the beans grew. A dramatic image travelled further than an ordinary recovery.

Interviewer: So the flood had no lasting effect?

Gardener: I wouldn't say that. Two older members left because replacing their tools was expensive. We missed their knowledge. Still, nine families worked there until the council sold the land three years later.

Interviewer: What would you change in the museum caption?

Gardener: Give both dates. Say the flood damaged the gardens in 2006 and the sale ended access in 2009. Otherwise, a natural event receives responsibility for a human decision.

Interviewer: Do you have anything to support that distinction?

Gardener: My planting diary and the final rent receipt. Memories can wander; those documents help me keep the sequence straight.

Hi Kamol,
I thought the Palace closed because nobody wanted films, but Rano found letters about a broken boiler. There were cancelled shows that winter. The exhibition made me question the newspaper's explanation. Shall we visit on Saturday and compare the documents ourselves? I'd like to hear your view.

Reading · The Market Bell

Before the covered market opened, traders used to gather along Station Road. At six each morning, a caretaker would ring a brass bell, and deliveries stopped while shoppers entered. The system sounds charming in recorded memories, but it did not suit everyone. Wheelchair users often struggled with the uneven pavement, and wet weather ruined paper packaging.

During the move into the new hall, photographer Denis was documenting the old stalls. While he was interviewing a fruit seller, a delivery van blocked the entrance. Two customers waited in the rain while workers argued about whose turn it was to unload. His photograph captured the disagreement, although the exhibition originally described it as a friendly morning gathering.

Denis asked for that caption to be changed. He did not want to erase the affection traders felt for their old workplace. He wanted the display to acknowledge that belonging and inconvenience existed together.

The new hall lost the bell but gained a level entrance and a covered delivery area. Some sellers still missed seeing trains from their stalls. A useful history could preserve that loss without suggesting that every past arrangement was better. Remembering a place honestly means allowing several people to remember it differently.

Listening · The Night Shift Notebook

Host: You're collecting memories of the old bakery. What surprised you?

Former baker: People remember the smell, but few remember the noise. We used to start at midnight. The mixer would shake the shelf above it, and someone would catch the flour tin before it fell. It was a familiar joke, though probably not a sensible arrangement.

Host: Was every night like that?

Former baker: Usually, but one night in February was different. I was weighing flour when the lights went out. My colleague was checking the ovens, so she noticed immediately that the gas controls still worked. We stopped production anyway because we couldn't see the floor safely.

Host: Did you lose everything?

Former baker: No. A neighbouring restaurant lent us portable lamps, and we managed to save the dough. We delivered two hours late. I used to tell that story as proof that our team could solve anything.

Host: And now?

Former baker: Now I hear the part I left out: we had no emergency lighting. Our teamwork was excellent, but it compensated for a preventable problem. In the oral history recording, please keep both ideas. The younger bakers deserve an honest account, not just a story about how tough we were.

Writing namuna — urinishdan keyin

Dear Curator,
I visited the Palace exhibition yesterday and appreciated the opportunity to compare original documents. I am writing to suggest a small change to the introductory caption.

It currently presents declining interest as the main reason for closure. However, while I was reading the correspondence, I noticed that the boiler failed and several performances were cancelled. Residents used to attend summer screenings in similar numbers, which complicates the existing explanation.

Could the caption mention the heating problem alongside the financial uncertainty? A short note could also explain that the surviving accounts record ticket income rather than every expense. This would preserve the exhibition's clear narrative while showing where the evidence remains incomplete.

Thank you for considering this suggestion. I would be pleased to discuss it with your team.

Yours sincerely,
Aziza Karimova

Reading · The Rooftop Harvest Plan

The school gardening club has published its plans for the roof terrace. Volunteers are meeting the building engineer on Tuesday, and the safety inspection begins at ten. These arrangements are confirmed. The announcement also says that the club is going to grow vegetables for the canteen, but the quantities remain uncertain.

A few members want to promise a weekly basket for every class. Club leader Malika thinks that would confuse an ambition with an agreement. The group has measured the available space, yet it has never grown crops at this height. Wind may dry the soil faster than expected, and the water supply still needs approval.

Instead, the first season will focus on herbs in movable containers. When the engineer approves the layout, volunteers will order the containers. They will not buy them before permission arrives. Malika has offered to contact a nearby gardener if the first seedlings struggle.

The announcement may sound less exciting after these changes, but it gives readers a clearer picture. A timetable describes what is arranged; a plan describes what people intend; a promise creates an expectation others may rely on. A small harvest delivered reliably could build more trust than a generous weekly basket that exists only on a poster.

Listening · A Coach Changes the Itinerary

Coach: Before you pack for our coastal walk, I need to explain Saturday's arrangements. The train leaves at eight fifteen. We're meeting outside the station at eight, and Leila has booked the group tickets.

Participant: Are we going to follow the cliff path as advertised?

Coach: That's still the intention, but the forecast shows strong wind. We're going to check the local conditions on Friday evening. If the path closes, we'll use the sheltered valley route.

Participant: My brother has never walked with a group. Will the alternative be easier?

Coach: Yes, it will be shorter, although the ground can be muddy. Tell him to bring suitable shoes. We won't decide on the cliff just because people want impressive photographs.

Participant: I can send him the equipment list now.

Coach: Thanks. I've already sent it to registered walkers, but guests may not have received it.

Participant: Shall I bring extra water for everyone?

Coach: Bring one spare bottle if you can. I'll carry the emergency supply. Once we reach the coast, we'll explain the final route before anyone leaves the station.

Participant: That sounds sensible. Knowing the alternative now makes the uncertainty less worrying.

Coach: Exactly. A backup plan lets us keep the outing enjoyable without pretending we control the weather.

Writing namuna — urinishdan keyin

An exciting announcement can attract volunteers, but it can also create expectations that a new team cannot meet. I think community projects should distinguish confirmed arrangements from hopes before they ask people to commit their time.

The rooftop garden illustrates this well. The volunteers are meeting an engineer on Tuesday, and the inspection begins at ten. Those details are firm. Providing vegetables for every class is a different kind of statement because nobody knows the likely harvest yet.

Some people will argue that cautious language makes a project sound weak. That is a real concern when organisers need enthusiasm. However, ambition can remain visible without becoming an unconditional promise. The club could describe its long term aim and explain what the first season will establish.

I would suggest three headings in every announcement: confirmed, planned and dependent on approval. When permission arrives, the team will move the relevant task into the confirmed section. Readers will then see progress rather than repeated excuses.

I am going to use this approach for our neighbourhood activities. Honest uncertainty gives volunteers a reason to trust later updates, even when the final result is smaller than everyone originally imagined.

Reading · Four Months Without Disposable Cups

The design studio has used washable cups since May. Its manager recently announced that the change has prevented thousands of disposable cups from becoming waste. The statement sounds convincing, but assistant manager Otabek has asked how the number was calculated.

Before May, the studio bought cups in large boxes. Buying a box did not mean every cup was used immediately. Some remained in a cupboard, while others went home with staff after events. Comparing purchases alone therefore gives an uncertain picture of actual waste.

This month, Otabek has been recording drinks served and cups washed. He has already discovered that visitors sometimes bring their own bottles. He has not yet measured the water used for washing, and he refuses to label the new system perfectly sustainable before that information is available.

The change still has practical benefits. Staff have stopped carrying full rubbish bags downstairs every afternoon, and several employees prefer drinking from ceramic cups. These observations support continuing the scheme without supporting every claim made about it.

Otabek is not trying to reverse the decision. He is trying to describe its results accurately. A useful update can celebrate what has changed, explain what has been measured and admit what the team still does not know.

Listening · The Choir's Missing Voices

Presenter: Your choir has been rehearsing in the new hall for three months. Has the move been successful?

Conductor: Musically, yes. We have already learned two difficult pieces, and the sound is much clearer than in the old classroom.

Presenter: Has everyone welcomed the change?

Conductor: Not everyone. Two singers have stopped attending regularly. At first I thought they had lost interest, but I called them last week. One now works an evening shift; the other cannot catch the last bus home from this location.

Presenter: Have you changed the rehearsal time?

Conductor: Not yet. We have been discussing an earlier finish, but some members cannot arrive before seven. Moving everything earlier might exclude a different group.

Presenter: What have you tried so far?

Conductor: We recorded the difficult sections on Monday, and both absent singers have used the recordings. That helps them practise, although it does not replace singing together.

Presenter: You sound pleased but cautious.

Conductor: That's fair. We have gained a better room, not solved every problem. I have been keeping attendance notes since the move, and next month we'll ask members about travel as well as music. A choir needs people who can reach the rehearsal, not merely a room in which their voices would sound wonderful.

Writing namuna — urinishdan keyin

Hi Sardor,
We've used washable cups since May, and the rubbish bags are noticeably lighter. However, nobody has measured the washing water yet. I think the manager should explain that gap before publishing a large waste reduction figure. Have you seen a simple way to track water use?
Cheers,
Otabek

Reading · Why the Bridge Survey Was Late

By the time engineer Saida reached the footbridge, the inspection team had already closed it. Residents assumed that a dangerous crack had appeared overnight. In fact, the engineers had been monitoring a loose joint for six weeks, and the closure was planned so they could measure it without pedestrians crossing.

The confusion began earlier. The council had prepared a notice, but nobody had checked whether it appeared on the public website. A draft remained in an internal folder while residents continued using the crossing. When barriers finally arrived, the missing explanation made an ordinary inspection look like an emergency.

Saida has been answering questions outside the barrier this morning. She has spoken to seventeen residents and has written their main concerns on a board. Several people need a shorter alternative route because the official diversion adds twenty minutes to their walk.

The team cannot promise a reopening date until the measurements are complete. However, Saida can explain what had happened before the closure and what is happening now. That distinction reduces speculation without hiding uncertainty.

The episode shows why communication belongs inside a technical project. Engineers may have been doing careful work for weeks, yet silence can make that work appear sudden, careless or secretive to the people affected by it.

Listening · The Rehearsal Recording

Producer: You've been listening to the rehearsal all afternoon. Have you found the source of the strange echo?

Sound engineer: Yes. Before the musicians arrived, someone had moved a loudspeaker behind the microphones. I had been testing the original arrangement for an hour, so my earlier recording sounded clean.

Producer: Had the room itself changed?

Sound engineer: No. The curtains were in the same position. I checked that first because we had been discussing new curtains last week.

Producer: Can we use any of yesterday's performance?

Sound engineer: I've recovered the introduction and the final song. I've been working on the middle section, but the voices overlap too much with the reflected sound. More processing would make them unnatural.

Producer: The sponsor expects a full recording.

Sound engineer: I understand. Still, sending damaged audio under a polished title would be misleading. We could release the two clear sections and record a short explanation from the musicians.

Producer: That is less than we promised.

Sound engineer: It is, and we should acknowledge it. We had not marked the speaker positions, so the volunteer who moved one did not know they mattered. Let's fix our setup notes before blaming an individual. The next session needs a reliable process as much as it needs better sound.

Writing namuna — urinishdan keyin

Dear Studio Manager,
I am writing about the proposed update on our washable cup scheme. The change has brought visible benefits, but the current estimate of avoided waste needs further explanation.

Before the scheme began, we had been purchasing cups in bulk. Some remained unused, so purchase totals cannot show exactly how many cups we discarded. This month I have been recording drinks served and cups washed. I have also noted visitors who bring their own bottles.

Could we delay the numerical claim until we have measured washing water and checked the remaining disposable stock? Meanwhile, we can report the reduction in rubbish collections and describe our measurement method.

This approach would recognise the team's work while giving colleagues a clearer basis for judging the results.

Kind regards,
Otabek Salimov

Reading · The Seed Library's Second Spring

Last spring, the village seed library distributed envelopes collected from local gardens. Organisers expected recipients to return fresh seeds after harvest, but only a third did so. An early report described the result as a lack of commitment.

Volunteer Madina has since interviewed fifteen participants. Some had grown healthy plants but did not know how to collect seeds. Others had planted varieties that flowered too late for the local season. One family had saved seeds carefully, then missed the return day because the notice arrived during a school holiday.

Before the interviews, organisers had been discussing a deposit to encourage returns. Madina's findings changed the conversation. Money might influence behaviour, but it would not teach someone when a seed is ready or make a late plant mature faster.

This year, the library is holding two practical workshops. The first starts next Saturday, and participants are bringing photographs of their plants. Organisers will send reminders when collection time approaches. They have also separated missing returns from failed harvests in their records.

The project has not proved that deposits are always unhelpful. It has shown that the same visible outcome can have several causes. A more useful second season begins by asking what happened between receiving an envelope and returning one.

Listening · The Apprentice's Portfolio

Tutor: You've brought fewer photographs than I expected for your carpentry portfolio.

Apprentice: I know. I used to photograph only finished furniture. While I was repairing the café stools, I didn't take any pictures of the joints before I covered them.

Tutor: That makes your decisions harder to assess, although the finished stools look good.

Apprentice: I've been keeping a work diary since June. It includes sketches and notes about mistakes. By the time I started the table project, I had learned to record each stage.

Tutor: Have you completed the table?

Apprentice: Not yet. I've made the frame, but I'm testing two finishes on spare wood. I was going to choose the darker one until I saw it under the café lights.

Tutor: What will you present next week?

Apprentice: The frame, the test pieces and the diary. The client is visiting on Thursday, so we'll agree on the finish then. I'll add the final photographs when the table is ready.

Tutor: Good. A portfolio can show judgement before an object is complete. Just distinguish what you've achieved from what you're planning.

Apprentice: That's a relief. I thought an unfinished project would automatically make the portfolio weaker.

Tutor: Only if you leave the learning invisible.

Writing namuna — urinishdan keyin

A finished object is useful evidence of learning, but it rarely tells the whole story. I would include process records in any practical course because they reveal decisions that a photograph cannot explain.

The apprentice has made a table frame and has been testing finishes. Although the table is incomplete, the diary shows why the darker finish became unsuitable under the client's lighting. That is a professional decision, not simply a delay.

There is a reasonable objection: learners might write impressive reflections without developing practical skill. Teachers therefore need to connect each explanation to something observable, such as a joint, a test piece or a revised drawing. The diary should support the work rather than replace it.

I used to think portfolios needed to contain only successful results. Now I find a documented correction more informative than an unexplained perfect surface. It shows what the learner noticed and how the next attempt changed.

For our course, I suggest a short conversation beside the actual work. Learners will explain one completed step, one earlier mistake and one planned improvement. When the project is finished, they can compare that plan with the outcome and reflect on the difference.

The Second Season of the Seed Shelf

120 daqiqalik uy vazifasining reading/listening qismi: 35 daqiqa; qo‘shimcha vaqt emas. 3 daqiqa taxmin; 12 daqiqa uzluksiz o‘qish; 15 daqiqa olti javob va dalil; 5 daqiqa tekshirish va bitta javobni yaxshilash.

The seed exchange has operated in our library since last spring. In its first month, visitors took many packets, but few returned information about what grew. The coordinator initially described the project as a gardening success. At that stage, however, the records showed interest in collecting seeds, not successful harvests.

Over winter, volunteers redesigned the labels. They had been recording only the plant name; now they also record the donor's growing conditions and the date of collection. Since February, borrowers have been sending short updates. Several report healthy plants, while others describe seedlings that failed after a cold week. These reports cannot establish a single cause, but they offer more useful context than the original packet count.

At the next meeting, the team will compare two seasons of records. It was going to rank donors by the number of successful plants, but abandoned that plan because gardens differ in soil, light and care. Instead, it will describe patterns and invite further observations. The project has improved its evidence, even though it has not eliminated uncertainty. Learning what a number cannot show is part of learning how to use it.

One volunteer suggests removing failed seedlings from the public display because they might discourage new borrowers. Another argues that such examples can show beginners that difficulties are normal and worth investigating. They agree to display a failed plant only with the grower's permission and an explanation of what is known. The label must not invent a disease or blame a gardener without evidence.

The next borrowing form includes an optional question about sunlight. It also offers an 'unsure' response, because not everyone knows how many hours of direct light a balcony receives. Requiring a precise number from every borrower would make the table look more complete while possibly making its contents less trustworthy. A small blank or qualified answer can be more honest than a confident guess.

The coordinator will compare reports from similar conditions, but will not describe that comparison as a controlled experiment. Gardeners use different watering routines and may report at different stages of growth. A future trial could standardise some of these factors. For now, the shelf remains a community learning project. Its strongest result may be a better question for the next season, supported by a clearer record of what volunteers observed and what they still need to find out.

Reading · Choosing a Mobile Classroom

The adult education team can rent either a small electric van or a larger diesel minibus for its travelling classroom. The van is cheaper to run and easier to park, but it carries fewer learners. The minibus has enough seats for twelve people, although several village lanes are too narrow for it.

At first, the team compared only the price per journey. That made the van look much more economical. However, the driver pointed out that two van journeys could use more staff time than one minibus trip. A low fuel bill does not necessarily mean a low overall cost.

There are also differences between villages. Most of the learners in Hill End can walk to a central square, whereas a few residents in Stone Lane need collection near their homes. Neither vehicle serves every location equally well. The team has little information about winter access, so a permanent choice would be premature.

The most practical proposal is to hire each vehicle for two teaching days and record travel time, missed pickups and attendance. Learners should be asked whether they can reach the stop comfortably. The better vehicle will be the one that makes lessons accessible within the budget, rather than simply the one with the lowest advertised running cost.

Listening · Two Ways to Store a Harvest

Farmer: The cooperative has two storage offers. The refrigerated room is colder and more expensive. The shaded warehouse costs less, but we can keep tomatoes there for only a few days.

Buyer: Is the colder room always better?

Farmer: Not for every crop. Some vegetables lose quality when they are too cold. We need enough space at the right temperature, not the lowest temperature available.

Buyer: How much of this week's harvest is already sold?

Farmer: Most of it. Only eight crates are waiting for buyers. Renting the largest room for such a small amount would be wasteful.

Buyer: Could we share it with another farm?

Farmer: Possibly. Both neighbouring farms have spare produce, but neither has confirmed quantities. We have a little time to ask, although we must decide by tomorrow.

Buyer: I can call them this afternoon. My concern is that the cheaper warehouse may become expensive if we lose the tomatoes.

Farmer: Agreed. Let's compare likely losses as well as rent. Last year we saved on storage and threw away several crates.

Buyer: Then the safest option isn't automatically the biggest or cheapest.

Farmer: Exactly. A modest shared room might suit us better, provided the crops need similar conditions. We should settle that before discussing how to divide the bill.

Hi Munisa,
The electric van is cheaper, but the minibus carries more learners. We have too little information about winter roads to choose confidently. I'd try both for two teaching days and compare missed pickups as well as costs. Can you help us ask learners about the stops?

Nodira

Reading · The Workshop Key

Members of the community print studio can now enter without a supervisor during designated evenings. Previously, even experienced printers had to wait for a staff member to unlock the room. The change follows a training programme in which members demonstrated that they could clean equipment and respond to a blocked exit.

Independent access does not mean unrestricted access. Members must sign the entry book, and they must not use the industrial cutter alone. They do not have to book ordinary printing tables, but groups larger than four need advance permission because the room has limited space.

A notice originally said that trained members could use all equipment. A volunteer questioned this wording after completing the course. She was able to operate the small press safely, but she had never received instruction on the cutter. The revised notice now separates access to the room from permission to use particular machines.

Some members find the distinctions unnecessarily complicated. Yet clear limits can make independence easier to manage. People know what they may do without asking and which decisions still require assistance.

The coordinator invites members to request additional training. Permission is therefore linked to demonstrated ability rather than confidence alone. Being willing to try a machine is not the same as being prepared to use it responsibly.

Listening · Access to the Recording Booth

Student: Could I use the recording booth on Friday? I can edit audio, but I've never used this microphone system.

Technician: You may book the booth, but you have to attend a short introduction first. I can show you the controls tomorrow.

Student: Would I be allowed to bring a friend to read the second part?

Technician: Certainly. You don't have to record alone. Your friend must sign in, and both of you must keep drinks outside.

Student: Last year I couldn't hear my voice through the headphones. I managed to finish with the laptop microphone, but the result wasn't very clear.

Technician: We'll check the monitoring setting together. You should be able to hear both voices before recording begins.

Student: Do we have to finish by four?

Technician: Yes, because another group has booked the room. You don't have to complete the editing here, though. You can take the files and work elsewhere.

Student: That's helpful. Could you reserve half an hour for the introduction?

Technician: I can offer twenty minutes at noon. That is enough for the basic setup. If you want to use the advanced effects, we'll arrange another session.

Student: I'd rather learn the essentials properly than rush through everything.

Technician: Good. Clear recording matters more than a complicated collection of effects.

Writing namuna — urinishdan keyin

Dear Education Coordinator,
Could we test both proposed vehicles before signing a long rental agreement? The smaller van can enter narrow lanes, while the minibus can carry the whole group in one journey.

I would like permission to hire each vehicle for two teaching days. During the trial, the driver would have to record journey times and missed pickups. Learners could explain whether they were able to reach the meeting points comfortably.

We do not have to buy new equipment for this comparison, since our existing materials fit in either vehicle. However, we must confirm that passengers with limited mobility can board safely.

Would you also clarify whether we are allowed to change collection points during the trial? This would help us respond to difficulties as they arise.

Yours sincerely,
Nodira Rasulova

Reading · The Parcel on the Wrong Shelf

When a customer could not collect her repaired camera, the shop assistant assumed the courier must have taken it. The collection shelf was empty, and a delivery driver had visited an hour earlier. However, those facts established an opportunity, not proof.

The manager asked everyone to check the repair room before contacting the courier. A technician might have moved the camera for a final test. Another customer could have received the wrong package, although the signed receipts made that less likely. Staff needed to investigate without presenting any possibility as an accusation.

The camera eventually appeared on a shelf marked urgent. A new employee had placed it there because the customer mentioned travelling the next day. He had also printed a second collection label, although the original was already attached. He needn't have printed another one; the extra label added confusion rather than useful information.

The manager recommended a single location for completed repairs and a separate note for urgent collections. Staff should check both the record and the physical item before promising that an order is ready.

The incident cost the customer twenty minutes. More seriously, a confident but unsupported explanation could have damaged the relationship with a reliable courier. Sensible procedures protect people from mistaken certainty as well as misplaced equipment.

Listening · Before the Evening Lecture

Organiser: There are only ten chairs in the lecture room. Someone must have misunderstood the booking.

Caretaker: Perhaps, but the extra chairs might still be in the corridor. The cleaning team was working there earlier.

Organiser: I ordered thirty. We had to borrow chairs last month, and I don't want another delay.

Caretaker: We should check the storage list before making calls. You don't need to order replacements yet.

Organiser: I already hired another ten this morning.

Caretaker: Then you may have acted too quickly. Look, the list shows twenty chairs waiting behind the screen.

Organiser: You're right. I needn't have hired those extras. Can we cancel them?

Caretaker: Possibly. You had better call now, before the driver leaves. Next time, ask for the room layout as well as the equipment total.

Organiser: I will. What about the microphone? Its light isn't on. It can't be working.

Caretaker: It might simply be switched off. Let me test it before we decide that it's broken.

Organiser: I'm turning every uncertainty into the worst explanation today.

Caretaker: Preparing for problems is useful, but checking evidence is part of preparation. We still have an hour. Let's use it to confirm what is missing rather than assume that everything is.

Writing namuna — urinishdan keyin

A quick explanation can feel reassuring when something goes wrong, but confidence is not evidence. In the camera shop, the assistant thought the courier must have taken the missing package. The courier had visited, yet several other explanations remained possible.

The camera might have been moved for testing, or another employee might have placed it elsewhere. Checking those possibilities would have prevented an unnecessary accusation. In fact, the camera was on the urgent shelf because someone wanted to help the customer.

Of course, staff sometimes need to act quickly. Waiting indefinitely for complete certainty can make a small problem worse. My suggestion is to separate immediate practical action from claims about responsibility. The assistant could apologise, ask the customer to wait and search the repair room without blaming anyone.

A short checklist would help: check the item record, inspect alternative locations and ask colleagues what they changed. Only then should staff contact an outside organisation with a factual question.

We should also admit unnecessary action. The second label needn't have been printed, but recognising that mistake is more useful than hiding it. Good judgement means adjusting the strength of our language to the strength of our evidence.

Reading · When the Public Clock Stops

The town clock stopped during a busy Saturday market. Within minutes, a social media post claimed that recent restoration work had damaged the mechanism. The repair company could not have caused the immediate stoppage by working that morning: its staff had left the tower two days earlier. That did not rule out every connection, but it weakened the specific story being shared.

A caretaker later found that the power supply had failed. The clock usually restarts automatically when electricity returns, but this time a protective switch stayed open. Residents should have waited for an inspection before describing the restoration as a failure.

The town now needs a communication rule. If the clock stops again, the caretaker will post a short notice at the market entrance. Unless an inspection identifies a cause, the notice will simply describe what is known. It will probably reduce speculation, although no notice can stop every rumour.

If the council had a larger maintenance budget, it could install a remote warning system. For now, a clear reporting process is more realistic. The lesson is not that residents should ignore faults. They should report them promptly while leaving room for explanations that have not yet been checked.

Listening · A Wet Weather Decision

Festival director: We should have published a rain plan before selling tickets. People are asking whether Saturday's storytelling event will happen.

Volunteer: The field is wet, but it can't have flooded overnight. I walked across it this morning, and the river is still below the bank.

Festival director: Fair correction. I shouldn't have repeated that description without checking.

Volunteer: If rain continues tomorrow, we'll move the sessions into the village hall. Unless we reduce the audience, though, everyone won't fit.

Festival director: What happens to ticket holders who cannot enter?

Volunteer: We could offer a second performance. If we had more storytellers, simultaneous sessions would be possible, but we only have three.

Festival director: Two performances are likely to be tiring.

Volunteer: Then shorten each one and provide a proper break. When performers lose their voices, nobody benefits.

Festival director: I agree. We'll ask them today rather than announce a solution on their behalf.

Volunteer: And tell ticket holders the decision deadline. Uncertainty becomes harder when people don't know when they will hear more.

Festival director: I'll publish an update at six tomorrow, even if the final location is still uncertain. We could have planned better, but we can still make the remaining decisions openly.

Volunteer: That should give families enough time to change their travel plans.

Hi Bek,
If the rain continues, the storytelling sessions will move into the hall. It isn't big enough for everyone, so we may need two performances. We should have planned this earlier. I'll check tomorrow's update at six before arranging transport. Would you still come to a shorter session?

Reading · The Scholarship Deadline

Dilshod missed a scholarship deadline because he waited for a reference letter that was not required until the second stage. If he had read the instructions more carefully, he would have submitted his form on time. That explanation is true, but it leaves out an important detail: the application page displayed two different dates.

The earlier date applied to student forms; the later one applied to references. Both appeared under the heading deadline, without a clear description. An experienced applicant might have understood the distinction, whereas someone applying for the first time could easily confuse them.

Dilshod wishes he had asked the office instead of relying on a friend's interpretation. He also wishes the website would separate the stages more clearly. If he had submitted in time, he might be preparing for an interview now. However, he cannot know whether his application would have been selected.

The office has agreed to revise the page, though it will not reopen the completed round. Dilshod hopes to apply next year, provided the eligibility rules remain the same. He is saving his documents in a labelled folder.

The useful response combines personal responsibility with better design. Saying that applicants should simply be more careful would ignore a preventable source of confusion; blaming the website alone would ignore the value of asking questions.

Listening · The Concert We Didn't Record

Singer: I wish we'd recorded our first concert. If we had brought a second battery, the camera wouldn't have stopped halfway through.

Guitarist: True, but if I were better at checking equipment, I would have noticed the low charge before we started. It wasn't only a missing spare.

Singer: We'd have a complete film for our website now if we'd checked everything properly.

Guitarist: Perhaps. The camera position was poor as well. Even if it had kept running, several performers would have been hidden behind the speaker.

Singer: So buying a battery won't solve the whole problem.

Guitarist: Exactly. I hope the next recording is better, but we need a plan. We can borrow two cameras as long as we return them on Monday.

Singer: What would you do if you were organising it?

Guitarist: I'd make a short test recording from each position and ask someone outside the band to watch it. We know the songs so well that we might overlook missing details.

Singer: I wish the venue would let us enter earlier.

Guitarist: Let's ask. They may agree, provided we explain why. Regret is useful if it changes the next rehearsal; repeating the same complaint won't restore the lost footage.

Singer: I'll write to the manager tonight.

Writing namuna — urinishdan keyin

Dear Festival Organiser,
Thank you for arranging an indoor alternative to Saturday's storytelling event. I support a shorter session, provided the performers agree and ticket holders receive clear entry times.

If a rain plan had accompanied the original announcement, families could have arranged travel with greater confidence. Some of us would now be less uncertain about attending. I wish the notice had explained what would happen if the hall could not accommodate everyone.

Could you confirm whether a second performance is available before tomorrow evening? Even if the weather improves, that information will help families who cannot wait until the last moment.

For future events, I suggest publishing a decision deadline and a backup location together. I hope these changes will make the festival easier to attend without placing unreasonable demands on the storytellers.

Yours faithfully,
Mira Ahmedova

Reading · Who Gets the Rehearsal Room?

Three music groups want the same rehearsal room on Thursday evenings. The youth orchestra has the most members, the folk trio has the fewest, and the accessible singing group needs the room's level entrance. Choosing by group size alone would produce a clear answer, but not necessarily a fair one.

The centre previously gave priority to whoever booked first. That rule favoured groups with a member who could check the website during office hours. If the centre had noticed this sooner, it might have avoided several disputes. Staff should have asked who could realistically use the booking system.

A new proposal offers rotating Thursdays, with alternative rooms where suitable. The trio can rehearse upstairs, whereas the singing group cannot. The orchestra could divide into smaller sections occasionally, although doing so every week would damage its preparation.

No group must give up its preferred time permanently. However, each must explain which needs are essential and which are flexible. If a group cancels, it will have to release the slot at least two days ahead.

The fairest arrangement may not give everyone identical treatment. It should give comparable opportunities while recognising real differences. A transparent explanation of exceptions is likely to earn more trust than a simple rule whose hidden disadvantages are never discussed.

Listening · Sharing the Sports Budget

Chair: We can afford either new team shirts or repairs to the practice court this term. The shirts are cheaper, but the court serves more people.

Player: The shirts matter for competitions. We should have replaced them last year.

Coach: I agree they're worn, but nobody has to wear a new shirt to practise. We mustn't ignore the loose surface near the goal.

Player: Could the damage have caused last week's fall?

Coach: It might have contributed, although we didn't see exactly what happened. We shouldn't state that as a fact.

Chair: If we repair the court now, we'll have little money left. Would sponsors help with shirts?

Player: Possibly, as long as their logos aren't larger than the team name. If we'd contacted them earlier, we might have new shirts already.

Coach: We can ask now. Even if nobody contributes, repairs will still benefit every practice group.

Chair: Then shall we prioritise the court and collect shirt quotations separately?

Player: Yes, provided we set a date to reconsider the shirts. Otherwise, they may disappear from the discussion again.

Chair: Fair request. We'll review sponsorship offers in six weeks.

Coach: This is a choice about timing, not a judgement that one group's pride is unimportant. We can recognise that pride while dealing with the more urgent problem.

Writing namuna — urinishdan keyin

Equal treatment is attractive because it is easy to explain, but identical rules can create unequal opportunities. The rehearsal room dispute shows why a community centre needs to examine circumstances before choosing a booking policy.

The largest group is not automatically the group with the strongest claim. The singing group needs a level entrance, while the folk trio can use an upstairs room. If both were offered the same upstairs alternative, only one would gain a usable option.

Supporters of a simple booking rule may worry that exceptions invite favouritism. That concern deserves an answer. Staff should publish the reasons for each exception and distinguish essential access needs from preferences. Groups must also release cancelled slots promptly so others can benefit.

The earlier system could have seemed fair to someone who was able to check the website all day. However, availability during office hours should not determine access to evening activities.

I would support rotating Thursdays, provided the centre reviews the arrangement with all three groups after a term. The review should consider actual participation and disruption to rehearsals. Fairness requires a process people can question, not merely a rule that looks tidy on a noticeboard.

Sharing a Room Fairly

120 daqiqalik uy vazifasining reading/listening qismi: 35 daqiqa; qo‘shimcha vaqt emas. 3 daqiqa taxmin; 12 daqiqa uzluksiz o‘qish; 15 daqiqa olti javob va dalil; 5 daqiqa tekshirish va bitta javobni yaxshilash.

Three groups want the community room on Thursday evenings. The choir has the most members, the homework club serves fewer people, and the craft group has attended for the longest time. Choosing only by group size would favour the choir; choosing only by history would favour the craft group. Neither rule automatically measures need.

The homework club cannot use the nearby hall because it lacks quiet tables. The choir could rehearse there, but would need help carrying a keyboard. The craft group can meet earlier if two members receive a lift. The coordinator proposes a four-week trial: homework stays in the room, choir uses the hall with transport help, and crafts meet before dinner.

Some members object that equal treatment should mean identical hours in the same place. Others argue that fair access may require different arrangements. The coordinator agrees to review attendance, travel difficulties and comments after the trial. If the alternative hall proves unsuitable, the plan will change. No group is promised permanent priority. The decision is justified by current constraints, and those constraints must remain open to challenge.

At the first review, the choir reports that carrying the keyboard takes longer than expected. The hall itself is suitable, but the promised trolley has a damaged wheel. This matters because a workable proposal on paper may depend on a small piece of equipment. The coordinator arranges a replacement rather than immediately concluding that the alternative venue is impossible.

Two craft members say that the earlier session clashes with school collection. Their original agreement had been based on the expectation of a later starting date, when a relative could help. The coordinator records the change without treating it as proof that they were uncooperative. Conditions can change after an agreement, and a fair trial needs a way to respond.

The next meeting will consider whether the room should rotate occasionally or whether a second quiet venue can be found. Attendance totals will remain useful, but they will be read beside reasons for absence. A nearly empty session may indicate lack of interest, inaccessible travel, or a temporary family commitment. The committee will not claim to know which explanation applies until it asks. Transparent decisions require not only a published rule but also an explanation of how new evidence can alter that rule.

h-30-1 · Match two meanings of fairness in the disagreement.

Ustoz kaliti: One view: identical hours/place. Other: different arrangements to achieve access.

Dalil: equal treatment should mean identical hours in the same place. / fair access may require different arrangements.

h-30-3 · Why does group size alone fail to settle allocation?

Ustoz kaliti: It ignores constraints such as homework needing quiet tables.

Dalil: The homework club cannot use the nearby hall because it lacks quiet tables.

h-30-4 · What would justify revising the trial?

Ustoz kaliti: Evidence of unsuitable hall/access problems in attendance, travel reports or comments.

Dalil: review attendance, travel difficulties and comments / If the alternative hall proves unsuitable, the plan will change.

h-30-5 · What specifically made the choir's transport difficult?

Reading · The Map with an Empty Street

A new walking map has been distributed at the visitor centre. Historic buildings are marked in blue, cafés are shown in orange, and public toilets are indicated by a familiar symbol. Yet the shortest street in the old quarter appears as an empty grey strip.

The omission was noticed by a shopkeeper whose doorway opens onto that street. Three small workshops were left out when business information was transferred from an older database. The designers were not told that the database had gaps, and the final draft was checked mainly for spelling.

Corrections are now being prepared. An online version has already been updated, while replacement paper copies will be printed next month. Existing copies are being given a small insert so visitors can find the missing workshops in the meantime.

The visitor centre's first statement said that errors had been made. That sentence acknowledged a problem but did not explain how it happened or who would prevent it recurring. A later statement described the transfer process and named the office responsible for checking business information.

Passive language is useful when the map or correction is the focus. However, it should not become a way of making responsibility disappear. Residents need both an accurate map and an understandable account of how accuracy will be protected.

Listening · Behind the Returned Books

Reporter: Several library books have been labelled unavailable this week. Are they being removed from the collection?

Librarian: No. They are being checked after a leak in the storage room. Some covers were damaged, but most pages are dry.

Reporter: How are the books selected for repair?

Librarian: Each one is examined by a conservation assistant. Minor damage is treated here; complicated cases are sent to a specialist. Twenty books have already been returned to the shelves.

Reporter: Were readers told what happened?

Librarian: A notice was posted at the entrance, but it wasn't added to the catalogue. People searching from home saw only the word unavailable, which understandably caused concern.

Reporter: Will that be changed?

Librarian: Yes. A short explanation will be attached to each affected record today. Readers will also be offered another edition where one exists.

Reporter: Some people say damaged books are simply thrown away.

Librarian: That hasn't happened in this case. Decisions about replacement are documented, and rare items are assessed separately. We cannot promise to save every ordinary copy, but disposal isn't our first response.

Reporter: So the important distinction is between temporary assessment and permanent withdrawal.

Librarian: Exactly. A short catalogue label can hide a long process. We need to make that process easier to understand.

Writing namuna — urinishdan keyin

Hi Lola,
Three workshops were left off the new walking map. The online version has already been corrected, but new paper copies won't arrive until next month. Small inserts are being added meanwhile. Let's collect one before our walk so we can visit the missing street too.
See you,
Dina

Who Gets the Rehearsal Room?

Three music groups want the same rehearsal room on Thursday evenings. The youth orchestra has the most members, the folk trio has the fewest, and the accessible singing group needs the room's level entrance. Choosing by group size alone would produce a clear answer, but not necessarily a fair one.

The centre previously gave priority to whoever booked first. That rule favoured groups with a member who could check the website during office hours. If the centre had noticed this sooner, it might have avoided several disputes. Staff should have asked who could realistically use the booking system.

A new proposal offers rotating Thursdays, with alternative rooms where suitable. The trio can rehearse upstairs, whereas the singing group cannot. The orchestra could divide into smaller sections occasionally, although doing so every week would damage its preparation.

No group must give up its preferred time permanently. However, each must explain which needs are essential and which are flexible. If a group cancels, it will have to release the slot at least two days ahead.

The fairest arrangement may not give everyone identical treatment. It should give comparable opportunities while recognising real differences. A transparent explanation of exceptions is likely to earn more trust than a simple rule whose hidden disadvantages are never discussed.

Sharing the Sports Budget

Chair: We can afford either new team shirts or repairs to the practice court this term. The shirts are cheaper, but the court serves more people.

Player: The shirts matter for competitions. We should have replaced them last year.

Coach: I agree they're worn, but nobody has to wear a new shirt to practise. We mustn't ignore the loose surface near the goal.

Player: Could the damage have caused last week's fall?

Coach: It might have contributed, although we didn't see exactly what happened. We shouldn't state that as a fact.

Chair: If we repair the court now, we'll have little money left. Would sponsors help with shirts?

Player: Possibly, as long as their logos aren't larger than the team name. If we'd contacted them earlier, we might have new shirts already.

Coach: We can ask now. Even if nobody contributes, repairs will still benefit every practice group.

Chair: Then shall we prioritise the court and collect shirt quotations separately?

Player: Yes, provided we set a date to reconsider the shirts. Otherwise, they may disappear from the discussion again.

Chair: Fair request. We'll review sponsorship offers in six weeks.

Coach: This is a choice about timing, not a judgement that one group's pride is unimportant. We can recognise that pride while dealing with the more urgent problem.

Oldingi writing namuna

Equal treatment is attractive because it is easy to explain, but identical rules can create unequal opportunities. The rehearsal room dispute shows why a community centre needs to examine circumstances before choosing a booking policy.

The largest group is not automatically the group with the strongest claim. The singing group needs a level entrance, while the folk trio can use an upstairs room. If both were offered the same upstairs alternative, only one would gain a usable option.

Supporters of a simple booking rule may worry that exceptions invite favouritism. That concern deserves an answer. Staff should publish the reasons for each exception and distinguish essential access needs from preferences. Groups must also release cancelled slots promptly so others can benefit.

The earlier system could have seemed fair to someone who was able to check the website all day. However, availability during office hours should not determine access to evening activities.

I would support rotating Thursdays, provided the centre reviews the arrangement with all three groups after a term. The review should consider actual participation and disruption to rehearsals. Fairness requires a process people can question, not merely a rule that looks tidy on a noticeboard.

Reading · The Sign That Could Not Be Replaced

A cracked railway sign was removed from the town museum's entrance after a visitor noticed a sharp edge. Several supporters asked why a modern copy could not be installed immediately. The curator explained that any replacement had to be distinguished clearly from the original object.

The old sign had been donated by a retired station worker. Before it reached the museum, it had been repainted twice, and parts of the lettering had been altered. Those changes made it imperfect as a guide to its original appearance, but valuable as evidence of continued use.

While a temporary board was being designed, the damaged sign was being examined by a conservator. Its surface could be stabilised, but the missing corner could not be reconstructed confidently from the available photographs. A complete replacement might therefore present an invented detail as historical fact.

The curator told supporters that a replica would be considered for outdoor use. She said the original would remain inside, accompanied by an explanation of its repairs. Neither object would be described as an untouched example.

This approach costs more effort than ordering a clean new sign. It also gives visitors a more interesting question: does an object's history end when it leaves the factory, or do later repairs become part of the history worth preserving?

Listening · An Announcement Before the Doors Open

Manager: The theatre seats will not be numbered for tonight's rehearsal. We told the invited audience that they could choose any place in the main section.

Usher: Can the balcony be used?

Manager: No. The lighting rail was being inspected this morning, and the area must be kept closed until the engineer signs the report.

Usher: Someone said the inspection had been completed.

Manager: The physical check had been completed by ten, but the written clearance had not been issued. Those are different stages.

Usher: I'll explain that if people ask. Should the accessible seats be reserved?

Manager: Yes. They must not be occupied by people who can use the other rows until guests needing them have arrived. Please offer a nearby alternative politely.

Usher: A parent told me her child couldn't see from the back. Could two front seats be held?

Manager: Certainly, provided they arrive before the introduction. Tell her that the sound may be loud there, so she can decide.

Usher: I'll put all that in the briefing.

Manager: Good. Don't simply repeat that the building is open. Some areas are available and others are restricted. A useful announcement should tell people what they can actually do, not leave them to discover the limits at a closed door.

Writing namuna — urinishdan keyin

Dear Visitor Centre Team,
Thank you for correcting the online walking map and providing inserts for the existing paper copies. These steps should help visitors find the three workshops that were omitted.

Your recent statement said that business information had been transferred from an older database. It also explained that the final draft had been checked mainly for spelling. Before replacement copies are printed, could local businesses be invited to check their own entries?

A simple review form could be distributed along each street. Replies should be compared with the map by the office responsible for business information, rather than accepted without checking.

Please also ensure that the inserts can be collected throughout the month. Clear temporary information will be needed until the revised edition is available.

Yours faithfully,
Dina Usmonova

Uy vazifasi uchun oldingi dars materiallari

The Map with an Empty Street

A new walking map has been distributed at the visitor centre. Historic buildings are marked in blue, cafés are shown in orange, and public toilets are indicated by a familiar symbol. Yet the shortest street in the old quarter appears as an empty grey strip.

The omission was noticed by a shopkeeper whose doorway opens onto that street. Three small workshops were left out when business information was transferred from an older database. The designers were not told that the database had gaps, and the final draft was checked mainly for spelling.

Corrections are now being prepared. An online version has already been updated, while replacement paper copies will be printed next month. Existing copies are being given a small insert so visitors can find the missing workshops in the meantime.

The visitor centre's first statement said that errors had been made. That sentence acknowledged a problem but did not explain how it happened or who would prevent it recurring. A later statement described the transfer process and named the office responsible for checking business information.

Passive language is useful when the map or correction is the focus. However, it should not become a way of making responsibility disappear. Residents need both an accurate map and an understandable account of how accuracy will be protected.

Behind the Returned Books

Reporter: Several library books have been labelled unavailable this week. Are they being removed from the collection?

Librarian: No. They are being checked after a leak in the storage room. Some covers were damaged, but most pages are dry.

Reporter: How are the books selected for repair?

Librarian: Each one is examined by a conservation assistant. Minor damage is treated here; complicated cases are sent to a specialist. Twenty books have already been returned to the shelves.

Reporter: Were readers told what happened?

Librarian: A notice was posted at the entrance, but it wasn't added to the catalogue. People searching from home saw only the word unavailable, which understandably caused concern.

Reporter: Will that be changed?

Librarian: Yes. A short explanation will be attached to each affected record today. Readers will also be offered another edition where one exists.

Reporter: Some people say damaged books are simply thrown away.

Librarian: That hasn't happened in this case. Decisions about replacement are documented, and rare items are assessed separately. We cannot promise to save every ordinary copy, but disposal isn't our first response.

Reporter: So the important distinction is between temporary assessment and permanent withdrawal.

Librarian: Exactly. A short catalogue label can hide a long process. We need to make that process easier to understand.

Reading · What the Meeting Actually Agreed

After a residents' meeting, a message circulated saying that the council had promised to remove every roadside tree. The official notes told a different story. The engineer had said that three damaged trees required inspection and that removal was one possible outcome.

The misunderstanding began when a resident who arrived late asked whether the trees would disappear. Another participant replied that the engineer had discussed removal. In later messages, discussion became a decision, and a possible decision became a promise.

Meeting secretary Feruza has prepared a clearer summary. It identifies the speaker behind each statement and separates proposals from agreed actions. The engineer offered to inspect the trees; the council representative promised to publish the findings; residents asked the team not to begin work without notice. No general removal programme was approved.

Feruza also keeps present tense where information is still current. The trees stand beside a school, and the pavement remains narrow. Changing every verb mechanically into the past could make continuing conditions sound outdated.

Accurate reporting is more than a grammar exercise. It requires attention to what a person actually committed to and what the audience may infer. A report that preserves uncertainty can be less dramatic than a rumour, but far more useful to people planning how to respond.

Listening · The Interview Summary

Editor: Your article says the chef refused to train local students. Is that what she said?

Reporter: She said she couldn't take a group this month because the kitchen was being refurbished.

Editor: Then the sentence is too broad. Did she discuss another date?

Reporter: Yes. She offered to host four students in November and asked whether they had completed basic hygiene training.

Editor: Include that. A temporary limit isn't a refusal to help.

Reporter: She also told me not to photograph the unfinished kitchen. I wrote that she wanted to hide the conditions.

Editor: That is an interpretation. Did she give a reason?

Reporter: She said the builders had left equipment across the floor and that visitors could trip.

Editor: Report the reason she gave. If you doubt it, you need evidence, not a suggestive phrase.

Reporter: Should I mention the student who complained about the delay?

Editor: Certainly. He said he had arranged transport already, didn't he? His inconvenience is relevant. We can show both the disruption and the chef's proposed solution.

Reporter: I'll revise the headline too. It currently makes the disagreement sound permanent.

Editor: Good. Our job is to make the situation understandable. A stronger accusation might attract attention, but it should never emerge merely because a sentence lost its time limit.

Writing namuna — urinishdan keyin

A meeting summary should help neighbours understand what will happen, not simply repeat the most alarming sentence. In the tree discussion, a possible outcome became a promise as messages passed between people.

The engineer offered to inspect three damaged trees. The council representative promised to publish the findings. Those commitments are different from an agreement to remove every tree, and residents need the distinction before organising a response.

I understand why people shorten messages. A long report may be ignored, especially in a busy group chat. However, brevity should remove repetition rather than remove uncertainty. A short sentence can still name the speaker and say whether an action was proposed, promised or approved.

Before forwarding a summary, I would ask three questions. Who made the statement? What exactly did that person commit to? Is the information still current? If any answer is missing, readers should be told that clarification is needed.

We should also preserve requests from people who may be affected. Residents asked the team not to begin without notice, which is relevant even though removal was not agreed. Accurate reporting allows disagreement to remain visible without turning every concern into a confirmed event.

Reading · The Bench with Two Names

The riverside bench whose plaque carries two names has become an unexpected meeting place. It commemorates a local carpenter and a school caretaker who used to repair playground equipment together. Neither person held public office, and some residents initially questioned why their names deserved a permanent place.

The application was supported by families whose children had used the repaired equipment. They described a form of contribution that rarely appeared in newspaper reports. The carpenter, who also trained young apprentices, donated spare timber. The caretaker organised repairs during holidays, when the playground was empty.

A committee member suggested putting the names on a general list of volunteers instead. That would recognise more people, but it would remove the particular story that made this partnership meaningful. The final design therefore includes a small link to other community histories.

Visitors sitting on the bench can read a short account without opening the link. Those wanting more detail can explore photographs and interviews. The committee avoided describing the pair as people who solved every local problem. It chose to recognise a specific contribution and invite others to add further stories.

A public memorial does not have to claim that its subjects were extraordinary in every respect. Sometimes it asks people to notice ordinary work that mattered deeply to particular neighbours.

Listening · Finding the Right Mentor

Coordinator: You asked for a mentor who works in publishing. Have you decided what kind of help you need?

Student: I want someone whose experience includes illustrated books. I'm interested in editing text that has to fit around pictures.

Coordinator: Then Samira may suit you. She works at a small press, where editors often discuss layout with designers.

Student: Is she the editor you mentioned last month?

Coordinator: Yes. Samira, who started as a translator, enjoys helping people compare different career routes. However, she prefers meeting students who have prepared specific questions.

Student: I was planning to ask her to read my entire manuscript.

Coordinator: That may be too much for an introductory meeting. You could send two pages and explain one decision you're struggling to make.

Student: Would she expect polished work?

Coordinator: No. The pages you bring should show your question clearly. A mentor isn't simply a person who tells you whether you are talented.

Student: That changes how I think about it. I had imagined waiting until everything looked impressive.

Coordinator: Students hoping to learn usually gain more from a focused problem than a flawless performance. Decide what you want to understand, and give her enough context to respond.

Student: I'll choose the scene where the picture and text repeat the same information.

Hi Ziyoda,
I've found a mentor whose experience includes illustrated books. Samira, who began as a translator, prefers focused questions. I'm going to send two pages where my text repeats the pictures, rather than the whole manuscript. Could you help me choose the clearest example before I contact her?

Reading · The Bicycle Lesson

Repairing a bicycle can teach more than watching someone repair it, but only if the learner is allowed to make meaningful decisions. At the neighbourhood workshop, volunteers used to take tools from beginners whenever a job became slow. Customers left with working bicycles but depended on the same help next time.

The coordinator has changed the sessions. Volunteers now ask learners to describe the problem before touching the bicycle. They let them test simple explanations and help them compare results. Nobody is expected to handle a repair that requires specialist equipment; having a wheel professionally rebuilt remains a sensible choice.

One participant, Nargiza, remembers paying for a brake adjustment without understanding what had changed. This month she remembered to photograph the cable before loosening it. When the brake still rubbed, she tried repositioning the wheel instead of tightening every screw. The problem disappeared.

Learning this way takes patience. A volunteer may stop to explain a small movement while several people are waiting. Nevertheless, the goal is not merely to turn bicycles around quickly. It is to make future problems less mysterious.

Participants are getting used to asking why a step is necessary. Some still prefer to have everything done for them. The workshop can respect that preference while keeping its teaching sessions different from a commercial repair service.

Listening · Learning to Use the Camera

Tutor: You remembered to bring the camera, but did you remember to charge the battery?

Learner: Yes. I also had the lens cleaned yesterday. I thought the spots in my photographs were caused by dust.

Tutor: They may have been. Let's take a test picture before changing the settings.

Learner: I keep trying to photograph birds, but they move before I can focus.

Tutor: Try focusing on the branch first. Then wait for a bird to land. You don't have to chase every movement.

Learner: That sounds easier. I'm used to taking pictures of buildings, which stay still.

Learner: Should I buy a faster lens?

Tutor: Perhaps eventually, but buying equipment won't replace learning to anticipate a subject. Stop checking every photograph immediately and watch what the birds do.

Learner: I remember seeing one return to the same branch yesterday.

Learner: So the exercise is really about attention.

Tutor: Partly. Technical settings matter, but knowing when to leave them alone matters too. Let the camera help you observe instead of letting its menus consume the whole session.

Writing namuna — urinishdan keyin

Dear Ms Samira,
The mentoring coordinator suggested contacting you because you have experience editing illustrated books. I am interested in learning how editors balance written information with visual storytelling.

I have attached two pages from a short manuscript. I tried removing several descriptive sentences, but I am not sure whether the remaining text gives readers enough context. The pictures already show most of the physical action.

Would you be willing to discuss this example in a brief meeting? I am not asking you to edit the complete manuscript. I would value understanding how you decide which details belong in the words and which can be left to the illustrations.

I will prepare specific questions and remember to bring both versions of the scene. Thank you for considering my request.

Kind regards,
Dilnoza Karimova

Reading · The Recipe Archive

The community centre is collecting recipes from older residents, but its first exhibition raised an unexpected problem. Several dishes were labelled traditional without identifying whose tradition was meant. Visitors from different families recognised the names but disagreed about ingredients and preparation.

Archive volunteer Yusuf interviewed the contributors again. One cook explained that she had replaced almonds with apricot kernels when almonds were expensive. Another said her mother used to steam a dish that neighbouring families baked. These differences had been removed during editing because the team wanted short, consistent recipe cards.

The revised archive preserves the variations. Each card identifies the contributor and includes a brief note about changes over time. Recipes donated by people who prefer privacy are listed under chosen names, with permission recorded separately. Contributors are invited to check the final wording before publication.

Some visitors would prefer a single correct version. However, the archive is intended to document lived practice, not settle every culinary argument. A neat standard recipe could be less faithful to that purpose than several slightly different accounts.

Yusuf has learned to ask what editing removes as well as what it improves. Keeping a detail that seems inconvenient may preserve the very evidence that makes an ordinary recipe historically interesting.

Listening · The Subtitle Review

Filmmaker: The subtitles have been checked twice. Are we ready to show the interview?

Translator: Almost. There is one sentence that could misrepresent the speaker. He said his family had moved because work was difficult to find. The subtitle says they were forced to leave.

Filmmaker: Isn't that a reasonable summary?

Translator: It adds a degree of pressure he didn't state. We should ask him whether that wording reflects what he meant.

Filmmaker: We invited him to review the film, but he hasn't replied.

Translator: Then keep the narrower wording for now. Silence cannot be treated as agreement.

Filmmaker: What about the joke near the end? A literal translation sounds strange.

Translator: We can adapt that, provided the humour remains directed at the same situation. I suggest adding a short phrase rather than replacing it with an unrelated local joke.

Filmmaker: The audience who saw the rough version liked the stronger sentence.

Translator: That doesn't make it more accurate. People whose experiences are being presented deserve to recognise their own meaning.

Filmmaker: You're right. I'll get the subtitle changed and send him the revised section.

Translator: Good. Editing should help viewers understand the speaker. It shouldn't quietly turn him into the character we think would make a more dramatic film.

Writing namuna — urinishdan keyin

A community recipe archive should preserve more than instructions for producing a meal. It can show how families responded to changing prices, available ingredients and personal preferences. Removing every variation would lose some of that history.

One contributor explained that she had replaced almonds with apricot kernels when almonds became expensive. That detail tells us something about daily life which a standard ingredient list cannot reveal. Recipes collected from different households should therefore retain their sources and meaningful differences.

There is a practical objection: visitors may find several versions confusing when they simply want to cook. The archive can address this by separating the main method from short historical notes. Readers who need instructions can follow them, while others can explore the context.

Contributors should also be invited to check how their words are presented. A polished card is not necessarily an accurate one, particularly if an editor has removed an explanation that seemed inconvenient.

I would publish a clear recipe beside a brief account of its development and links to related versions. This approach allows the archive to remain useful in a kitchen without pretending that a living tradition has only one authorised form.

A local archive asked residents to describe their first jobs. The interviews were recorded with permission, and volunteers were asked to prepare short extracts. One editor removed a speaker's account of leaving a factory because it interrupted an otherwise cheerful story. Another changed 'I wanted different work' to 'I had no choice', believing the stronger phrase would hold listeners' attention.

When the speakers reviewed the extracts, both requested changes. One said that the difficult departure explained why the later job mattered. The other said that the edited phrase exaggerated the pressure he had experienced. The archive restored the missing section and replaced the stronger wording with the speaker's own account.

The team still intends to shorten interviews. However, it now records significant edits and asks contributors to check them. People who prefer not to be identified can choose a public name while their consent record is kept separately. A concise extract can remain faithful to a complex life, but only if clarity does not become an excuse to remove the meaning that belongs to the speaker. Audience interest matters; it does not replace the contributor's authority over what they meant.

The editor asks how much checking is practical when many interviews are waiting. The archive decides to prioritise changes that affect cause, responsibility, consent or the speaker's attitude. Minor pauses can usually be removed without changing meaning, but joining two answers from different questions may create a statement the contributor never made. Such a change requires particular care.

A contributor who cannot use email is offered a printed transcript and a short meeting. The team does not treat a missing online reply as approval. It records which version each person reviewed, so that a later edit is not accidentally covered by consent given to an earlier one. This takes time, but it makes the process understandable to both volunteers and speakers.

For the exhibition, listeners can hear the short extract and read a note explaining where the full interview is available. Some recordings remain private at the contributor's request. The archive therefore cannot promise unrestricted access to every source. Instead, it can explain its selection and restrictions honestly. Preserving a person's story includes respecting what that person agreed to share, even when an unavailable passage would have made the exhibition more dramatic or convenient to organise.

Reading · A Cooler Square, a Quieter Business

The central square has become cooler since temporary shade sails were installed above the benches. Afternoon visitors stay longer because they can sit comfortably, and families have begun using the space after school. However, the change has not benefited every nearby business equally.

A café beside the shaded area reports more customers, whereas a kiosk behind one of the support posts has become harder to see. Its owner supports the cooling project but wants the layout adjusted. She argues that a public improvement should not hide an existing business unnecessarily.

Although the first evaluation celebrated increased footfall, it did not record where people stopped or which routes they took. Consequently, the total concealed important differences within the square. Due to the position of one sail, the kiosk's sign was almost invisible from the main entrance.

The designers have proposed moving the sign and narrowing the sail slightly. Despite losing a small amount of shade, visitors would retain most of the cooling benefit. The café owner has also offered to display directions to the kiosk.

The disagreement is not evidence that the project failed. Rather, it shows why a useful evaluation must look beyond an overall improvement. A design can be successful enough to keep and imperfect enough to change.

Listening · Why the Podcast Became Shorter

Host: Listeners noticed that our local history podcast is shorter this month. Did we run out of material?

Producer: Quite the opposite. We recorded so much that each episode lost its focus. Because every interview contained something interesting, we kept adding sections.

Host: Yet several listeners enjoyed the detail.

Producer: They did. However, others stopped listening before the central story was explained. A long episode isn't automatically a deeper one.

Host: What have we changed?

Producer: We now build each episode around one question. Extra interviews remain available in a separate collection, so interested listeners can explore them afterwards.

Host: Does that create more work?

Producer: A little. Despite the shorter running time, editing takes longer because every transition must earn its place. We also write clearer descriptions for the additional recordings.

Host: Some contributors may feel disappointed if their voices appear only in the extra material.

Producer: That's why we explain the structure before recording. The main episode offers a route through the subject, whereas the collection preserves a wider range of experiences.

Host: So accessibility and detail aren't necessarily opponents.

Producer: Exactly. Since people have different amounts of time, we can offer different ways in. The shorter format should make the story easier to follow without suggesting that the omitted experiences are unimportant.

Hi Rayhon,
The square feels cooler because of the new shade sails. However, one sail hides the kiosk's sign, so its owner is losing visibility. I support keeping the shade while adjusting the layout. Could we mention both points at tomorrow's meeting instead of treating the project as entirely successful?

The Recipe Archive

The community centre is collecting recipes from older residents, but its first exhibition raised an unexpected problem. Several dishes were labelled traditional without identifying whose tradition was meant. Visitors from different families recognised the names but disagreed about ingredients and preparation.

Archive volunteer Yusuf interviewed the contributors again. One cook explained that she had replaced almonds with apricot kernels when almonds were expensive. Another said her mother used to steam a dish that neighbouring families baked. These differences had been removed during editing because the team wanted short, consistent recipe cards.

The revised archive preserves the variations. Each card identifies the contributor and includes a brief note about changes over time. Recipes donated by people who prefer privacy are listed under chosen names, with permission recorded separately. Contributors are invited to check the final wording before publication.

Some visitors would prefer a single correct version. However, the archive is intended to document lived practice, not settle every culinary argument. A neat standard recipe could be less faithful to that purpose than several slightly different accounts.

Yusuf has learned to ask what editing removes as well as what it improves. Keeping a detail that seems inconvenient may preserve the very evidence that makes an ordinary recipe historically interesting.

The Subtitle Review

Filmmaker: The subtitles have been checked twice. Are we ready to show the interview?

Translator: Almost. There is one sentence that could misrepresent the speaker. He said his family had moved because work was difficult to find. The subtitle says they were forced to leave.

Filmmaker: Isn't that a reasonable summary?

Translator: It adds a degree of pressure he didn't state. We should ask him whether that wording reflects what he meant.

Filmmaker: We invited him to review the film, but he hasn't replied.

Translator: Then keep the narrower wording for now. Silence cannot be treated as agreement.

Filmmaker: What about the joke near the end? A literal translation sounds strange.

Translator: We can adapt that, provided the humour remains directed at the same situation. I suggest adding a short phrase rather than replacing it with an unrelated local joke.

Filmmaker: The audience who saw the rough version liked the stronger sentence.

Translator: That doesn't make it more accurate. People whose experiences are being presented deserve to recognise their own meaning.

Filmmaker: You're right. I'll get the subtitle changed and send him the revised section.

Translator: Good. Editing should help viewers understand the speaker. It shouldn't quietly turn him into the character we think would make a more dramatic film.

Oldingi writing namuna

A community recipe archive should preserve more than instructions for producing a meal. It can show how families responded to changing prices, available ingredients and personal preferences. Removing every variation would lose some of that history.

One contributor explained that she had replaced almonds with apricot kernels when almonds became expensive. That detail tells us something about daily life which a standard ingredient list cannot reveal. Recipes collected from different households should therefore retain their sources and meaningful differences.

There is a practical objection: visitors may find several versions confusing when they simply want to cook. The archive can address this by separating the main method from short historical notes. Readers who need instructions can follow them, while others can explore the context.

Contributors should also be invited to check how their words are presented. A polished card is not necessarily an accurate one, particularly if an editor has removed an explanation that seemed inconvenient.

I would publish a clear recipe beside a brief account of its development and links to related versions. This approach allows the archive to remain useful in a kitchen without pretending that a living tradition has only one authorised form.

Reading · The Water Refill Network

Several shops have agreed to refill visitors' water bottles without requiring a purchase. The town placed blue stickers in their windows so that walkers could identify participating businesses. Before the scheme began, organisers checked both tap access and staff availability.

The first map listed every volunteer shop, but it did not show opening hours. As a result, walkers sometimes reached a closed door. The revised version includes hours and a note advising people to carry some water in case a shop is unexpectedly unavailable. That is a precaution, not a claim that the network usually fails.

Shopkeepers can either fill bottles themselves or direct visitors to a clearly marked tap. Neither method should interrupt food preparation or block a narrow service area. In order to avoid confusion, the sticker explains which method each shop uses.

One owner worried that free water would replace drink sales. Another believed it might attract customers. The organisers will compare comments and sales patterns after the summer rather than promise either outcome now.

The network offers not only drinking water but also a reason for visitors to enter unfamiliar shops. Nevertheless, that wider benefit should be treated as a possibility. A practical service can justify itself without every advantage being exaggerated in the announcement.

Listening · The Costume Handover

Wardrobe lead: Before you take the costumes to the school, check both the garment labels and the box list. Last time, the right costumes arrived in the wrong boxes.

Volunteer: Should I pack extra shirts if someone changes size?

Wardrobe lead: Pack two spare shirts in case a label is wrong or a costume gets stained. If we actually need them, we'll record which student receives each one.

Volunteer: Where should the boxes go?

Wardrobe lead: Either the drama room or the office beside it. Neither the corridor nor the staircase is suitable because classes will be moving through those areas.

Volunteer: I'll call as soon as I arrive.

Wardrobe lead: Good. Wait until the teacher has checked the list before leaving. We need a shared record so that missing items can be traced later.

Volunteer: That sounds like a lot of paperwork for a short performance.

Wardrobe lead: It should take five minutes. The purpose is not only to protect the costumes but also to avoid asking families to replace something that was never handed over.

Volunteer: I hadn't thought of that.

Wardrobe lead: Clear records protect both sides. After the performance, we'll use the same list for returns. Keep a photograph on your phone as a backup, but leave the signed paper with the teacher.

Writing namuna — urinishdan keyin

Dear Design Team,
I am writing to support a small revision to the shade layout in the central square. The cooling effect should be preserved so that families can continue using the benches comfortably.

Before a final decision is made, could you check the kiosk's visibility from both the main entrance and the western path? The current sign is difficult to see, which may direct visitors elsewhere unintentionally.

I suggest testing either a narrower sail or a relocated sign. Photographs should be taken at several times of day in case changing light affects the result. The kiosk owner could then comment before any permanent work begins.

This would not only protect the benefits of the project but also address a specific disadvantage. Please publish the proposed arrangement once the checks are complete.

Yours faithfully,
Anora Saidova

A Cooler Square, a Quieter Business

The central square has become cooler since temporary shade sails were installed above the benches. Afternoon visitors stay longer because they can sit comfortably, and families have begun using the space after school. However, the change has not benefited every nearby business equally.

A café beside the shaded area reports more customers, whereas a kiosk behind one of the support posts has become harder to see. Its owner supports the cooling project but wants the layout adjusted. She argues that a public improvement should not hide an existing business unnecessarily.

Although the first evaluation celebrated increased footfall, it did not record where people stopped or which routes they took. Consequently, the total concealed important differences within the square. Due to the position of one sail, the kiosk's sign was almost invisible from the main entrance.

The designers have proposed moving the sign and narrowing the sail slightly. Despite losing a small amount of shade, visitors would retain most of the cooling benefit. The café owner has also offered to display directions to the kiosk.

The disagreement is not evidence that the project failed. Rather, it shows why a useful evaluation must look beyond an overall improvement. A design can be successful enough to keep and imperfect enough to change.

Why the Podcast Became Shorter

Host: Listeners noticed that our local history podcast is shorter this month. Did we run out of material?

Producer: Quite the opposite. We recorded so much that each episode lost its focus. Because every interview contained something interesting, we kept adding sections.

Host: Yet several listeners enjoyed the detail.

Producer: They did. However, others stopped listening before the central story was explained. A long episode isn't automatically a deeper one.

Host: What have we changed?

Producer: We now build each episode around one question. Extra interviews remain available in a separate collection, so interested listeners can explore them afterwards.

Host: Does that create more work?

Producer: A little. Despite the shorter running time, editing takes longer because every transition must earn its place. We also write clearer descriptions for the additional recordings.

Host: Some contributors may feel disappointed if their voices appear only in the extra material.

Producer: That's why we explain the structure before recording. The main episode offers a route through the subject, whereas the collection preserves a wider range of experiences.

Host: So accessibility and detail aren't necessarily opponents.

Producer: Exactly. Since people have different amounts of time, we can offer different ways in. The shorter format should make the story easier to follow without suggesting that the omitted experiences are unimportant.

Oldingi writing namuna

Hi Rayhon,
The square feels cooler because of the new shade sails. However, one sail hides the kiosk's sign, so its owner is losing visibility. I support keeping the shade while adjusting the layout. Could we mention both points at tomorrow's meeting instead of treating the project as entirely successful?

Reading · What 'Almost Everyone' Conceals

A survey of the arts centre began with an enthusiastic headline: almost everyone enjoyed the exhibition. The list of responses was long, and nobody on the organising team doubted that visitors had a positive experience. Yet the headline depended on a small word doing a large amount of work.

Only people who completed the digital form were counted. Several visitors asked for paper, but the desk had none. Others left before reaching the final screen, where the satisfaction question appeared. The number of completed forms was therefore different from the number of visitors.

The exhibition itself was engaging. A beautiful old wooden cabinet held tools used by local craftspeople, and the accompanying interviews were fascinating. Acknowledging the survey's limits does not require pretending the display was disappointing.

Nevertheless, precision matters when results influence future spending. Most respondents enjoyed the exhibition is supported by the evidence. Most residents enjoyed it is not, because many residents never attended. Everyone was delighted is stronger still and ignores even the negative responses that were collected.

The centre plans to offer a paper form next time and record how many visitors respond. Better wording will not solve every sampling problem, but it can stop a limited finding from becoming an unlimited claim. Enthusiasm is useful; accurate enthusiasm is more useful.

Listening · A Room Description That Misled Us

Guest: Your advert described the room as completely quiet. I could hear deliveries every morning.

Owner: I'm sorry. Most guests find it quiet, but the bakery next door receives flour at seven.

Guest: Then completely is misleading. I wasn't expecting silence all day, but that word influenced my choice.

Owner: You're right. I should say the room faces a courtyard and is usually quiet outside delivery hours.

Owner: There is a desk, but it may look larger because of the camera angle. It's a small square wooden table, really.

Guest: I was planning to work there for a week. A precise description would have helped.

Owner: I'll add the measurements. The room is comfortable for holidays, but not everyone needs the same facilities.

Guest: Exactly. I wasn't disappointed by an ugly room. I was disappointed by the difference between the description and the practical conditions.

Owner: Would a desk in the shared lounge help for the remaining days?

Guest: Yes, provided it is available in the mornings.

Owner: It is. I'll reserve it and update the advert tonight.

Guest: Thank you. Specific information will probably attract guests whose needs fit the room better, even if the description sounds less impressive.

Speaking

Reklama yoki hisobotda jozibador umumiy sifatlar o‘rniga aniq cheklovlarni yozish foydalimi? 2 daqiqa davomida argument, dalil, qarshi argument va unga javob bering.

Mezon: Everyone/list of ... bilan agreement ni saqlaydi; only/almost/most doirasini va gradable/non-gradable sifatlarni aniq ishlatadi. · Pozitsiyasini matndagi ikki dalil bilan asoslaydi; bitta qarshi argumentga aniq javob beradi. · Ikki daqiqada kirish, bog‘langan asoslar va xulosani yetkazadi.

Writing

Forumga so‘rov natijalarini aniq bayon qilish haqida post yozing. San’at markazi misoli, jozibali sarlavha tarafdoriga javob va yaxshiroq jumla taklifini kiriting. 180–200 so‘z yozing.

Mezon: Respondent va tashrifchi farqini ochadi, aniq sarlavha beradi va ikki ma’lumot yig‘ish yaxshilanishini taklif qiladi. · Janrga mos uslubni saqlaydi va maqsadli grammatikadan kamida ikki o‘rinli misol ishlatadi. · 180–200 so‘z chegarasiga rioya qiladi; fikrlarni izchil bog‘laydi.

Writing namuna — urinishdan keyin

Small words can change the size of a claim. Almost everyone enjoyed an exhibition sounds close to universal approval, but the meaning depends on who was asked and whose answers were included.

At the arts centre, only completed digital forms were counted. Visitors who wanted paper could not respond in that way, and some people never reached the final question. The list of answers is useful, but it does not represent every visitor automatically.

A better headline would say that most respondents enjoyed the exhibition. This is still positive, and it identifies the group behind the conclusion. Nobody needs to describe an engaging display as disappointing just because the survey has limitations.

Some organisers may argue that precise language makes publicity less exciting. I disagree. Specific details about the exhibits can create interest without stretching the findings. A description of the cabinet and recorded interviews would tell potential visitors more than another exaggerated adjective.

For the next survey, the centre should offer both paper and digital options and report the response rate. Clear language and a better collection method work together. Neither guarantees perfect evidence, but both help readers judge how much confidence a positive result deserves.

Reading · The Quiet Carriage Request

A regional rail operator is considering a quiet carriage on its busiest afternoon service. Passengers have asked whether calls will be prohibited and where families with young children will sit. The operator's first announcement answered neither question, saying only that a calmer journey was being developed.

Passenger representative Kamila supports the idea but wants practical details. She asks, 'Could you explain how staff will be handling complaints?' A rule that depends on passengers confronting one another could create more tension than it removes.

The proposed carriage will not be silent. Door announcements will continue, and passengers will be talking when they need assistance. The aim is to discourage sustained loud conversations and phone calls, not prevent every necessary sound. Staff will be checking the arrangement during a four week introduction period.

Some commuters think the plan is unnecessary. Others, including people who find noise exhausting, see a real benefit. Kamila is thinking about both groups when she suggests clear signs and an alternative carriage with no special restrictions.

A good consultation should make disagreement specific. Asking whether people like quiet is less useful than asking how the rule will operate and what will happen when needs conflict. Courtesy is not simply a polite tone; it includes giving people enough information to make a reasonable choice.

Listening · Planning a Shared Office Day

Colleague: Could you tell me whether the meeting room is free tomorrow morning?

Coordinator: It is until eleven. After that, the design team will be using it for interviews.

Colleague: We won't be disturbing them if we finish at half past ten, will we?

Coordinator: No, but please leave ten minutes to put the chairs back. They need a different layout.

Colleague: So do we. I think our group will need a circle rather than rows.

Coordinator: That's fine. I'm thinking about moving the spare tables today to make more space.

Colleague: Do you know where the portable screen is?

Coordinator: In the cupboard beside reception. You haven't used it before, have you?

Colleague: No, and neither has my colleague. Could someone show us how it opens?

Coordinator: I'll be checking equipment at nine. Join me then, and we can set it up together.

Colleague: Thanks. I was worried that asking basic questions would make us seem unprepared.

Coordinator: Asking now is preparation. It is much easier than discovering a problem while participants are waiting.

Colleague: Will you be working nearby during the session?

Coordinator: Yes, but I'll be taking calls for part of it. Write down the main instructions so you can manage without interrupting me every time.

Reading · The Observatory Opening

The university observatory will welcome local schools next month. By the opening day, technicians will have installed a safer viewing platform and teachers will have received a short orientation guide. During the first evening, volunteers will be explaining the equipment while small groups wait their turn.

The publicity team was going to promise that every child would see Saturn. Astronomer Laylo objected. Cloud cover could prevent any outdoor observation, and even clear skies would not guarantee that every visitor could use the telescope at the best moment.

The revised programme includes an indoor activity using archived images. By the time each group leaves, pupils will have compared two observations and written a question for a researcher, regardless of the weather. They may still see Saturn, but learning will not depend entirely on that opportunity.

Some organisers worry that mentioning clouds will reduce bookings. Laylo argues that disappointment is more likely when an uncertain experience is advertised as certain. A clear alternative can make the visit more credible.

At the review meeting, the team will be examining pupil questions as well as attendance totals. A crowded evening will show demand; the questions may show what visitors noticed. By then, the team will have gathered evidence about both access and learning, rather than relying only on a photograph of a queue.

Listening · The Last Day of the Exhibition Build

Project lead: What will your team be doing at three tomorrow?

Installer: We'll be attaching the final labels. By then, we will have positioned all the display cases, but the audio stations won't have been tested.

Project lead: Visitors arrive at five. Will you have finished the sound checks by four?

Installer: Yes, provided the recordings arrive tonight. We were going to use temporary files, but the curator said the final versions would be ready this evening.

Project lead: I need to distinguish a plan from a dependency. If the files are late, what can open safely?

Installer: The visual displays can. We can explain that the audio will follow, rather than play versions that contain errors.

Project lead: Good. By the time the doors open, we will have checked every public route as well.

Installer: Who will be recording any faults during the preview?

Project lead: Two volunteers. They won't be guiding groups; they'll be observing where people hesitate or ask for help.

Installer: That should tell us more than asking whether everything looks attractive.

Project lead: Exactly. We expect some adjustments. The aim is to identify them before regular visits begin, not to pretend that the opening proves the exhibition is finished forever.

Installer: I'll send a list of completed tasks and remaining dependencies after lunch.

Writing namuna — urinishdan keyin

Dear Passenger Services Team,
I am writing about the proposed quiet carriage trial. I welcome the attempt to support passengers who find sustained noise tiring, but I would appreciate more detail about the evaluation.

By the end of the four week period, what information will you have collected? Staff will be handling complaints during normal services, so a brief record of recurring difficulties could be useful. Feedback should include passengers in neighbouring carriages as well.

The original announcement was going to introduce a calmer journey without explaining the operating rules. Could you publish those rules before the trial begins and state how necessary conversations will be treated?

I hope the final report will describe both benefits and unresolved problems. A clear account will help passengers understand any permanent decision.

Yours faithfully,
Kamila Nurmatova

Reading · A Certificate That Explains Itself

The community learning centre is redesigning its end of course certificate. The old version stated that a learner had successfully completed the programme, but it did not explain what completion meant. Some learners attended every session; others missed classes but produced strong independent work.

The new certificate will describe participation separately from demonstrated skills. By the final meeting, each learner will have selected two pieces of work and explained one important revision. Teachers will be discussing those choices with learners rather than simply counting completed pages.

Although a single score would be easier to compare, the centre does not claim that its internal course provides an official examination result. A short profile can be more informative because it names the tasks completed and the support used. Everyone receives the same opportunity to present evidence, while individual strengths may differ.

The team was going to include a confident label for every skill. However, teachers recognised that some conclusions rested on only one task. Those areas will be described as needing further evidence.

A certificate should not promise more than the course has established. By the time learners leave, they should understand both what they can show and what they intend to improve. That makes the final document a useful record of learning rather than a decorative claim whose meaning nobody can explain.

Listening · The Final Project Conversation

Tutor: By Friday, you will have completed your community interview project. What will you be presenting at the final session?

Learner: I'll be showing two edited extracts and explaining why I changed the introduction. I was going to present the full recording, but it repeats several points.

Tutor: Could you tell me how you'll preserve the speaker's meaning while shortening it?

Learner: I'll keep the sentences that explain her main concern. Although the shorter version is easier to follow, I'll provide the complete transcript so that classmates can check the context.

Tutor: You haven't treated silence as agreement, have you?

Learner: No. She has approved the extracts, and I've recorded the changes she requested. I think the result is fairer now.

Tutor: So do I. What remains uncertain?

Learner: One interview cannot represent the whole neighbourhood. I'll say that clearly. I'm also thinking about interviewing someone with a different experience next term.

Tutor: Good. By the time the discussion ends, the class should have understood both your conclusion and its limits.

Learner: Will everyone be giving feedback during the presentation?

Tutor: They'll be taking notes first. Afterwards, each person will ask one evidence question. This is our internal learning review, not an official test score. The aim is to make your next decisions more thoughtful.

Writing namuna — urinishdan keyin

Finishing a course should give us more than a document to display. It should help us explain what we can do, what evidence supports that claim and what still needs practice.

The proposed certificate separates participation from demonstrated skills. I support this because attending every lesson and producing effective work are related but different achievements. By the final meeting, each learner will have selected two examples and explained a revision, which gives the discussion a concrete basis.

A single score would certainly be easier to compare. However, convenience does not make a score more informative, especially when the course is an internal learning programme rather than an official examination. A short profile can identify the tasks and the support used without suggesting a wider guarantee.

During my final presentation, I will be explaining how feedback changed one piece of work. I will also acknowledge a skill for which I have too little evidence. Next term, I intend to collect examples from different situations so that my conclusions become more reliable.

A useful certificate marks a stage in learning. It should make the next step clearer instead of encouraging us to treat one successful task as proof that improvement is complete.

What the Final Report Can Promise

120 daqiqalik uy vazifasining reading/listening qismi: 35 daqiqa; qo‘shimcha vaqt emas. 3 daqiqa taxmin; 12 daqiqa uzluksiz o‘qish; 15 daqiqa olti javob va dalil; 5 daqiqa tekshirish va bitta javobni yaxshilash.

The community tutoring project is preparing its annual report. By the final meeting, tutors will have reviewed two pieces of work from each learner who chooses to participate. During the meeting, they will be discussing revisions with learners and recording how much help each task required. The first draft of the report said that everyone had reached the next language level. The coordinator removed that sentence: the project had not used a common assessment, and several learners had submitted only one piece of work.

The revised report will distinguish attendance, completed tasks and demonstrated skills. It will include examples with permission, although a successful example will not be presented as proof of the same outcome for every participant. Some volunteers worry that cautious wording will discourage donors. Others argue that a precise account makes the work more credible because it identifies what support actually achieved.

The team was going to publish a single success percentage. Instead, it will describe patterns, limits and next steps. By publication day, learners will have checked the descriptions of their own work. The report should celebrate progress while leaving enough detail for readers to understand what the celebration is based on.

Before the report is sent to donors, a tutor checks a sample of its examples against the original work. In one case, the learner's final paragraph is fluent, but the teacher supplied several linking phrases. The example can still demonstrate progress if that help is stated. Removing the support note would make the achievement appear more independent than the record shows.

Another learner attended irregularly but revised a difficult task several times. Her work deserves attention even though attendance alone would make her contribution look limited. The team will avoid replacing one crude measure with another. Neither a full register nor a polished final page captures the whole process without context.

The donors will receive a short explanation of how examples were selected. Learners who prefer privacy can decline publication without losing access to tuition. The report will also identify an area where the project lacks enough evidence and describe how next year's tasks will address it. This does not mean postponing every conclusion until certainty is perfect. It means making claims proportional to the available record, allowing readers to distinguish a demonstrated result from a promising possibility and a future intention. That distinction is part of the project's responsibility to learners as well as to funders.
