Reading · A Library Beyond Office Hours

The district library proposes opening until nine on two evenings each week because many residents finish work after its current closing time. A consultation received eighty responses, and fifty supported the change. However, the responses came mainly from existing members, so they cannot represent every household in the district. Staff suggest a six-week trial rather than a permanent extension.
The additional hours would use the present budget by shortening two quiet mornings. This matters because a longer timetable is not automatically a larger service. Parents who visit with young children might lose a convenient session. The manager therefore wants attendance recorded by time and purpose, not just as one impressive total.
Some opponents worry about noise outside the entrance. That concern deserves a practical response, such as clear closing announcements and a staff presence at the door. It does not prove that evening access is unnecessary. Equally, supporters should not describe every quiet morning as wasted time: a few visitors may depend heavily on it.
The trial should compare who gains access and who loses it. Due to limited staffing, the final choice must balance different needs rather than promise that every visitor can have every hour.

Listening · The Repair Shop's Evening Experiment

Owner: Customers keep asking us to stay open later. Because they collect appliances after work, our five o'clock closure causes difficulties. I'm considering Thursday evenings.
Technician: I understand the demand, but the workshop isn't simply a collection desk. Repairs require concentration, and tired staff may make mistakes.
Owner: I wasn't proposing a longer working week. We could start later on Thursdays due to the additional evening shift.
Technician: Then our morning customers would face the same problem in reverse. Some older customers travel before the buses become crowded.
Owner: Fair point. What evidence would help us decide?
Technician: Record actual collection requests for a month. Telephone enquiries are useful, but someone asking about late opening isn't necessarily someone who will use it.
Owner: Could we separate repairs from collections? One person could manage completed orders between five and seven.
Technician: Possibly, provided no technical diagnosis is promised then. People sometimes arrive with what they call a tiny question and unpack an entire washing machine problem.
Owner: So the trial notice needs clear limits.
Technician: Exactly. I support testing access, not advertising services we cannot safely provide. Let's review collection numbers and missed morning visits together before making the arrangement permanent.

Hi Nila,
I'm pleased about the evening library trial because I usually finish work late. Still, I'm worried about parents losing their morning visits. I'll send the manager a suggestion to record both groups' needs during the six weeks. Shall we try the first Thursday session together?
Best,
Aziza

Reading · When a Trial Looks Successful

A neighbourhood pool introduced discounted lunchtime entry for six weeks. Attendance rose by a third, so its first report called the scheme a clear success. Although more people entered the building, ticket income fell slightly. The report also omitted whether the new visitors were previously inactive or simply changed the time of their usual swim.

This does not mean the discount failed. A public facility may reasonably prioritise access over income. Nevertheless, the purpose needs to be stated before the results are judged. If the aim was to reduce crowding in the evening, the relevant evidence is evening occupancy, not merely lunchtime attendance.

Despite these gaps, the experiment produced one useful finding. Several nearby office workers formed a regular swimming group and reported that a fixed meeting time helped them continue. Their comments suggest a social benefit, though a small group cannot speak for everyone.

The next report should therefore compare attendance across the whole day and include staff costs. It should also ask occasional users why they stopped coming. An attractive photograph of a busy pool is encouraging; however, a photograph cannot show who stayed away or whether the improvement lasted after the discount ended.

Listening · Discussing a Faster Check-In

Manager: Our new kiosk has reduced the average check-in time, so I want to remove the old reception desk.

Receptionist: Although most guests finish quickly, some need help with names, languages or access requests. Their waiting time has increased because one employee now handles every difficult case.

Manager: The average still improved by three minutes.

Receptionist: Yes, but an average can hide very different experiences. A guest who finishes in thirty seconds and another who waits fifteen minutes do not receive the same service.

Manager: Would keeping both systems defeat the purpose of automation?

Receptionist: Not necessarily. Despite the kiosk's speed, we still need a visible route to personal assistance. We could reduce the desk rather than remove it.

Manager: That would preserve part of the staffing cost.

Receptionist: It would. However, repeated complaints also consume staff time. Yesterday I explained the same error to six guests because nobody had updated the on-screen instructions.

Manager: Then let's improve those instructions and measure assisted check-ins separately.

Receptionist: Agreed. I am not defending a desk for sentimental reasons. I want us to remove unnecessary work without removing necessary help. After another fortnight, we can compare both speed and unresolved problems instead of relying on one average.

Writing namuna — urinishdan keyin

Dear Library Manager,
Thank you for inviting comments on the proposed evening opening trial. I support testing later access because residents who work during the day may currently be unable to visit.
Although the proposal offers a clear benefit, shortening two mornings could disadvantage parents and older members. I therefore suggest recording attendance separately for each affected session rather than reporting only the total number of visits. Please also ask users whether the revised timetable prevents them from accessing a service they need.
Despite the staffing limits, a six-week trial should provide useful evidence if its aims are published in advance. Could the final report include both evening demand and lost morning access? This would help members understand the eventual decision and suggest realistic adjustments.
Yours sincerely,
Aziza Karimova

Reading · A Tool Library or a Cheap Drill?

Two neighbourhoods have chosen different ways to make household tools affordable. One runs a lending library, whereas the other negotiates discounts at a hardware shop. The library spreads the cost of rarely used items across many borrowers. The discount scheme gives people permanent access, but each household still needs storage and maintenance.

Supporters of lending point to a carpet cleaner that was borrowed thirty times in one year. It was such a popular item that the library bought a second machine. Yet not every tool circulates so well. An unusually heavy drill remained on its shelf because beginners found it intimidating. The collection therefore needs regular review rather than endless expansion.

The shop scheme is simpler to administer. Customers choose their own products, while volunteers only arrange the discount. However, a cheaper purchase can still be unnecessary. One resident admitted that his bargain drill had spent longer in its attractive box than outside it.

Neither approach is automatically more responsible. Lending works best when collection times, training and repairs are reliable. Discounts are more suitable for equipment people use frequently. The sensible question is not which scheme sounds more generous, but which one matches actual patterns of use and the capacity of local volunteers.

Listening · Two Ways to Learn a Language

Tutor: One course offers live weekly meetings, whereas the other provides recorded lessons. Which arrangement suits your team?

Supervisor: Recordings are easier for shift workers. Our timetable changes so frequently that a fixed meeting excludes someone almost every week.

Tutor: That is a strong argument. On the other hand, live sessions create an immediate reason to prepare. Some learners collect recordings without actually watching them.

Supervisor: Our team is motivated, but I accept that access is not the same as participation.

Tutor: Exactly. Last term one group had such a large video library that members didn't know where to begin. We replaced it with a short weekly sequence and a discussion slot.

Supervisor: Could we keep the discussion optional?

Tutor: Yes, although optional activities need a clear purpose. A meeting to solve actual communication problems is more attractive than a meeting merely to prove attendance.

Supervisor: Then recordings can introduce language, while a fortnightly session deals with examples from work.

Tutor: That sounds realistic. We should still provide feedback for people who cannot attend.

Supervisor: Agreed. I don't want flexibility to become a polite word for studying entirely alone. Let's test the combination with one team before purchasing access for the whole organisation.

Mezon: Ikki modelni taqqoslab, foydalanish tezligi va xizmat ishonchliligiga asoslangan xulosa beradi. · Qabul qiluvchi va janrga mos uslubda fikrlarni mantiqan bog‘laydi. · 180–200 so‘z chegarasini saqlaydi; maqsadli grammatikani ikki marta aniq ishlatadi.

Writing namuna — urinishdan keyin

Owning every household tool is convenient, but convenience alone does not make every purchase sensible. I would support a small lending library for equipment that residents use only occasionally.
A carpet cleaner is a good example. In the reading, one machine was borrowed thirty times in a year. Sharing it reduced the need for many families to buy and store the same bulky item. A lending service can also offer practical instructions, which matter more than an attractive discount for an inexperienced user.
However, borrowing has real disadvantages. Collection times may be inconvenient, and a damaged tool can interrupt somebody's project. A library that keeps expanding without enough volunteers may promise more than it delivers. Meanwhile, someone who uses a drill every week has a reasonable case for owning one.
I therefore favour a mixed approach. Share expensive items with low individual use, while arranging discounts for frequently needed equipment. Review borrowing records before adding more products, and publish clear repair and collection arrangements. The aim should be useful access rather than the largest possible collection. Otherwise, our community may simply create a much bigger cupboard of objects that nobody uses.

Reading · A Market Prepared for Rain

The organisers of a neighbourhood market have ordered removable covers in order to keep the event outdoors during light rain. They will not cancel merely because the forecast mentions showers. Instead, they have agreed on clear conditions for moving indoors, including strong wind and standing water near electrical equipment.

Volunteers will inspect the site before stalls open. They will keep a paper list of sellers in case the mobile connection fails, and they will call each seller if the venue changes. The distinction matters: a backup is prepared beforehand, whereas a call follows a specific decision.

Some traders argue that preparation creates unnecessary expense. Their concern is understandable after two completely dry years. However, the covers can be reused, and the alternative indoor space requires an advance reservation anyway. Waiting until the first storm would leave everyone competing for the same limited room.

The team also plans signs so that visitors can find the indoor entrance without asking at every stall. As soon as a move is confirmed, one volunteer will update the website while another checks the street signs. The plan does not eliminate bad weather; it prevents ordinary uncertainty from turning into several contradictory announcements delivered through increasingly wet phones.

Listening · Preparing a Remote Workshop

Trainer: I'll send the worksheets today so that participants can download them before the workshop.
Assistant: Should we also send a recording link in case somebody loses connection?
Trainer: We won't have a recording until afterwards. For now, send a short summary and a telephone contact. If a participant disconnects, we can help them rejoin.
Assistant: Some people may think the summary replaces the workshop.
Trainer: Then explain its purpose. It is a backup, not the whole lesson. We need live discussion to compare the examples.
Assistant: When should I admit people from the waiting room?
Trainer: As soon as you verify their names. Keep unfamiliar names waiting until we confirm registration, but contact them privately rather than announcing a problem to everyone.
Assistant: I also want to test captions in order to support participants who need them.
Trainer: Good. Test the technical vocabulary first. Last week's automatic captions turned 'project funding' into 'project pudding', which was memorable but not useful.
Assistant: I'll check the key terms and keep a written glossary beside the slides.
Trainer: Exactly. Preparation should make participation easier without promising that technology will be perfect. After the session, we can ask which backup materials people actually needed and revise the system accordingly.

Writing namuna — urinishdan keyin

Hi Bek,
The market's rain plan sounds sensible. I'll print the seller list in case the connection fails, and I'll help update signs if we move indoors. Could you check the covered entrance with me before stalls open? That should save visitors from wandering around in the rain.
Cheers,
Malika

Reading · Repairing More Than Objects

A volunteer repair cafe advertises both practical assistance and opportunities to learn. Visitors can either leave a simple item with a volunteer or remain at the table and observe the process. Neither option guarantees a successful repair, and the organisers state that clearly on the booking form.

The learning element is not only a pleasant extra but also a possible way to reduce future waste. For example, a visitor who learns to clean a blocked filter may avoid replacing an appliance unnecessarily. Nevertheless, the cafe does not record such later decisions, so it cannot claim to have measured every environmental benefit.

Its strongest evidence is modest and specific: during the last session, volunteers restored eighteen of twenty-seven items. Four needed unavailable parts, while five were unsafe or beyond the team's expertise. Publishing those categories builds more trust than announcing that the event 'saved everything'.

Some residents would prefer a paid repair service with a fixed deadline. That is a reasonable alternative, especially for essential equipment. Moreover, volunteers should not be expected to replace professional services for every household. The cafe's value lies in extending options, sharing knowledge and directing difficult cases elsewhere. A successful community project can acknowledge its limits without turning its publicity into an apology.

Listening · A Museum's Two Ticket Options

Director: We can either offer a low fixed price or introduce a voluntary contribution. Both approaches are more accessible than our current ticket.
Treasurer: A voluntary contribution may work, but income would be less predictable. Neither goodwill nor a busy entrance automatically pays for maintenance.
Director: True. It could attract people who assume the museum is beyond their budget.
Treasurer: Then we should test that claim. For instance, ask visitors whether price influenced their decision, without making them justify their finances at the desk.
Director: I like that. The change should not only increase attendance but also make people feel welcome.
Treasurer: And we need clear wording. 'Free entry, suggested contribution' means something different from a compulsory charge with a friendly name.
Director: Some donors might compensate for lower payments.
Treasurer: They might; however, we should not build the entire budget on that hope. Keep a reserve and review income monthly.
Director: So a three-month pilot, private optional feedback and a visible explanation of where donations go?
Treasurer: Yes. I support a carefully measured experiment. I simply want the museum to remain open after the enthusiastic launch photographs have disappeared from everyone's feed.
Director: Fair enough. Our announcement can describe the opportunity and the uncertainty together.

Writing namuna — urinishdan keyin

Dear Market Coordinator,
Thank you for sharing the proposed wet-weather arrangements. I support preparing both removable covers and an alternative indoor venue, since waiting for severe weather could leave traders without a workable option.
I would be pleased to help not only with printed seller lists but also with the entrance signs. Clear signs would reduce confusion for visitors, while a paper contact list would remain useful if the mobile connection failed. For example, one volunteer could update the website as another checks the physical directions.
Could you confirm who will authorise a move indoors and how that decision will reach volunteers? Neither sellers nor visitors should receive conflicting messages. I suggest testing the contact chain before market day and naming one person responsible for the final announcement.
Yours sincerely,
Malika Saidova

Reading · Who Benefits from the Car-Free Sunday?

The town's first car-free Sunday drew a large crowd into the central square. Cafes reported strong sales, while a furniture shop said customers could not collect bulky purchases. Both reports may be accurate because businesses use the same street in different ways. A single total for visitor numbers would miss that distinction.

The organisers closed the road in order to create space for walking and public activities. They also provided a delivery window before nine. However, the notice reached some traders only two days beforehand, so several existing collections could not easily be rearranged. Better communication would address that problem without necessarily abandoning the event.
Residents raised a different concern: traffic moved into neighbouring streets. Although the square was quieter, those households experienced more noise. The next trial should therefore monitor surrounding roads as well as the closed area. Otherwise, an improvement in one visible location may simply transfer inconvenience elsewhere.
A second event is justified if organisers use the first as evidence rather than as a celebration that cannot be questioned. They should publish both gains and costs, consult people beyond the square, and announce arrangements early. Success means a workable balance of access and public space, not merely a photograph with fewer cars.

Listening · Should the Shared Desk Trial Continue?

Team Lead: Our shared-desk trial has reduced unused office space, but the feedback is mixed. We need a recommendation for the next quarter.
Analyst: The savings are clear. However, staff who need specialised equipment spend time rebuilding their workspace each morning.
Team Lead: Could we reserve a few permanent stations so that those tasks remain efficient?
Analyst: Yes. Either a fixed station or a reliable equipment locker could help, depending on the role. We should ask about tasks rather than rank people by seniority.
Team Lead: Some colleagues say fixed desks would undermine fairness.
Analyst: Equal furniture is not always equal access. A worker using two calibrated monitors has a different requirement from someone mainly attending meetings.
Team Lead: What about social contact? The trial was supposed to encourage new conversations.
Analyst: We have comments about that, but no consistent evidence. People may meet different colleagues while also losing contact with their immediate team.
Team Lead: Then we should retain the trial and revise its rules?
Analyst: For another month, yes, provided we measure setup time and missed collaboration as well as space savings. Keep spare stations in case bookings fail. The system should support work, not turn finding a chair into everyone's first project of the day.
Team Lead: I'll present that as a conditional recommendation.

Writing namuna — urinishdan keyin

I would support another car-free Sunday, but not a monthly commitment yet. The first event showed that the square can become an attractive public space. It also revealed problems that deserve more than a photograph.
Cafes benefited from visitors, whereas a furniture shop struggled with collections. These experiences do not cancel each other out. They show why organisers need to consider different kinds of business. An early delivery window is useful, but traders must receive enough notice to rearrange existing appointments.
The traffic in neighbouring streets is an important issue. A quieter square is not a complete success if nearby households receive all the displaced noise. The next trial should count traffic around the area as well as inside it and invite comments from those residents.
Some supporters may worry that further checks will delay a popular idea. I understand that concern, yet a short evaluation could prevent repeated mistakes and strengthen support. Announce the next date early, publish the delivery arrangements, and compare benefits with inconvenience afterwards. If the revised event improves access without simply moving problems elsewhere, a regular programme would have a stronger case. Public enthusiasm is valuable, but practical evidence should shape the final timetable.

The Street Trial and Its Exceptions

120 daqiqalik uy vazifasining reading/listening qismi: 35 daqiqa; qo‘shimcha vaqt emas. 3 daqiqa taxmin; 12 daqiqa uzluksiz o‘qish; 15 daqiqa olti javob va dalil; 5 daqiqa tekshirish va bitta javobni yaxshilash.

The town closed one shopping street to cars for four Sundays so that families could walk more comfortably. Pedestrian counts rose, and a café reported stronger sales. However, the pharmacy near the far entrance received fewer older customers. Its owner supported cleaner air but said that the nearest accessible parking space was too distant. The first report celebrated the total increase without mentioning that distribution.

A transport officer proposed moving two accessible spaces closer and allowing deliveries before the pedestrian hours began. Although that would reduce the length of the completely car-free section, it might preserve access for people who could not walk far. The café owner worried that exceptions would confuse visitors, whereas the pharmacy owner thought a clear sign could explain them.

The council will continue the trial in order to test the revised arrangement. It will record both total visits and access complaints. More pedestrians are evidence of use, not proof that every resident benefits equally. A successful trial should identify which parts work and which need adjustment, rather than turn a promising change into a claim that no problems remain.

Before the second trial, a researcher spends an ordinary Sunday walking the approaches to the street. She notices that the busiest entrance has a smooth pavement, while the route from the bus stop includes a high kerb. A simple count at the central square would miss that difference. She asks volunteers to record where visitors enter and whether they turn back, without assuming why every person changes direction.

The pharmacy owner also points out that sales figures are imperfect measures of access. A customer may successfully collect medicine without buying anything extra, while another may buy several items on behalf of neighbours who stayed at home. The café's higher sales and the pharmacy's lower visitor count therefore describe different aspects of the trial. They should be reported separately rather than forced into one score.

For the next report, the council will publish the dates and observation periods beside each figure. Weather, opening hours and the location of signs will be noted too. The officer does not expect this record to remove disagreement. She hopes it will make the disagreement specific enough to act on. Residents will be able to ask whether a proposed change addresses a documented barrier, instead of being asked to declare themselves simply for or against a car-free street.

h-25-1 · Match café owner, pharmacy owner and officer to their concerns/proposal.

Ustoz kaliti: Café: confusing exceptions; pharmacy: access with clear signs; officer: closer accessible parking/early deliveries.

Dalil: The café owner worried that exceptions would confuse visitors, whereas the pharmacy owner thought a clear sign could explain them. / moving two accessible spaces closer and allowing deliveries h-25-2 · What mechanism may explain fewer older pharmacy customers?

Ustoz kaliti: Accessible parking was too far away.

Dalil: the nearest accessible parking space was too distant.

h-25-3 · Why is increased pedestrian traffic insufficient to establish equal benefit?

Ustoz kaliti: The total conceals reduced access for some customers.

Dalil: The first report celebrated the total increase without mentioning that distribution.

h-25-4 · Why continue rather than immediately declare permanent success?

Ustoz kaliti: To test revised access arrangements and monitor complaints as well as totals.

Dalil: continue the trial in order to test the revised arrangement. It will record both total visits and access complaints.

h-25-5 · Why cannot café sales and pharmacy visitor counts simply become one success score?

Ustoz kaliti: They measure different activities; medicine access can succeed without additional purchases.

Dalil: The café's higher sales and the pharmacy's lower visitor count therefore describe different aspects of the trial.

h-25-6 · Why record observation dates and periods?

Ustoz kaliti: To make comparisons interpretable alongside weather, hours and signs.

Dalil: the council will publish the dates and observation periods beside each figure.

Reading · The List Is Not the Community

The list of registered volunteers is growing, but the coordinator is cautious about calling that growth a stronger community. A name on a list indicates interest; it does not show how often someone participates or whether the work is useful. Everyone receives a welcome message, yet not everyone finds a suitable first task.

The centre has introduced short introductory shifts. A group of experienced volunteers meets newcomers and explains what each role involves. This is more demanding than sending a general invitation, but early feedback suggests that people appreciate knowing whom to ask for help. Nobody is expected to understand the whole organisation on their first morning.

There is also a problem with how success is described. Volunteering can build confidence, whereas the volunteering required for a particular project may involve repetitive work that offers little choice. Treating all participation as equally rewarding overlooks that difference.

The coordinator now reports active shifts, completed tasks and reasons for leaving alongside registration numbers. Some trustees find the new report less impressive because it contains fewer large totals. However, a smaller accurate picture is more useful for planning than a large uncertain one. The centre needs reliable information about participation, not a list that merely looks busy.

Listening · What Does 'Everyone Agrees' Mean?

Editor: Your article says everyone in the building supports the new roof garden. How did you establish that?
Reporter: The residents' meeting approved it, and nobody there objected.
Editor: How many flats were represented?
Reporter: Twelve out of thirty. The meeting was on a weekday afternoon.
Editor: Then the support at that meeting is clear, but the opinion of the whole building isn't. Some residents may have been working.
Reporter: I can change it to 'Residents at the meeting supported the proposal.'
Editor: Good. Also, the collection of comments is interesting, but it isn't a survey with a representative sample.
Reporter: Should I remove the positive quotations?
Editor: No. Keep them and explain their source. Enthusiasm is part of the story. The problem is making the evidence carry a claim it cannot support.
Reporter: One resident said the garden would transform the building.
Editor: That is a prediction. Attribute it clearly rather than presenting it as an established result.
Reporter: Understood. I'll ask management whether a second consultation is planned.
Editor: Excellent. Accuracy doesn't require a lifeless article. It requires readers to distinguish what happened, what people hope, and what remains unknown. Those differences are often more interesting than a headline claiming universal agreement.

Writing namuna — urinishdan keyin

Hi Sara,
The centre's new introductory shifts sound useful. Everyone gets a clear first task, so joining should feel less confusing. I'm going on Saturday to see whether the library role suits me. Would you come too? A huge volunteer list means little if nobody knows where to start.
Best,
Lola

Reading · An Old Chair in a New Exhibition

A small regional museum has received a beautiful old wooden chair from a local school. At first, the donation seemed unremarkable. The museum already owns several chairs, and visitors rarely travel across town simply to inspect another seat. The accompanying papers, however, connect this object to evening literacy classes held in the school after normal lessons.

The distinction between an object and its documented history matters. Wood can reveal how furniture was made, while a written account may explain how it was used. Neither source is complete by itself. A polished surface does not prove that a chair belonged to a particular teacher, and a family memory may confuse two similar objects.

The curator plans to display the chair beside copies of attendance records. She will describe the connection as probable rather than certain because one date remains inconsistent. Some donors worry that cautious wording makes the story less attractive. Yet uncertainty can invite visitors to investigate rather than simply admire.

The display will also explain why the classes took place at school, not in a purpose-built adult centre. The institution was available in the evenings, and its familiar setting reduced costs. The chair becomes interesting through that social context, not through an exaggerated claim that it changed history alone.

Listening · Choosing Materials for a Public Notice

Designer: We can print the notice on thick paper or use a small reusable board. Which suits the centre?
Manager: The board costs more initially, but the timetable changes every month. We use a surprising amount of paper already.
Designer: Then a plain white magnetic board may be practical. It won't look as elegant as a framed poster, though.
Manager: Elegance isn't the main issue. People need to read the information from the entrance, including visitors who are unfamiliar with the building.
Designer: Where exactly will it stand?
Manager: In the hall beside reception. Not outside, where rain would damage it, and not behind the desk, where the queue hides it.
Designer: I can bring a sample tomorrow. Would you also like a paper showing the proposed layout?
Manager: Yes, one printed sheet would help the team discuss it. We need evidence about readability before ordering ten boards.
Designer: That distinction matters. A material saving is useful only if the information remains accessible.
Manager: Exactly. I don't want to reduce paper consumption by replacing readable notices with something nobody understands. Let's test one board for a week and ask users to find a particular class time without staff assistance.

Writing namuna — urinishdan keyin

Dear Volunteer Coordinator,
Thank you for introducing short orientation shifts for new members. The arrangement should help applicants understand the work before making a regular commitment, and I would like to attend the next library session.
Could you confirm the starting time and explain whether participants need any previous experience? A brief description of the tasks would also help me prepare appropriately. I am interested in organising materials, but I would prefer guidance before assisting visitors independently.
I suggest providing a simple printed card with the name of an experienced contact person. The card could remain useful after the introductory session, especially for someone who feels uncomfortable interrupting a busy team. Clear information and a welcoming first shift seem more valuable than increasing registration numbers alone.
Yours sincerely,
Lola Akhmedova

Reading · Only the Headline Was Simple

A science centre described its new exhibition as 'absolutely unique' and promised that visitors would be amazed. The opening survey produced a more complicated picture. Many visitors were interested in the demonstrations, but several found the instructions confusing. The exhibition was not necessarily disappointing; the route through it was simply unclear.

One report stated that visitors almost completed every activity. Another said that almost every visitor completed an activity. These sentences sound similar, yet they describe different outcomes. The first concerns how far people progressed; the second concerns how many people participated at all. A small change in adverb position can therefore alter the apparent success of the entire project.

The evaluation team rewrote its summary using specific observations. Most visitors completed at least one activity, while fewer than half reached the final station. Families described the opening demonstration as fascinating, but some were exhausted before finding the quieter area. That evidence suggests a layout problem rather than a complete failure of content.

The centre will improve signs and add seating before buying more equipment. Its next advertisement may sound less dramatic, but the practical changes are more likely to help. Visitors need an engaging experience, not a competition between the strongest adjectives in the dictionary.

Listening · Reading Customer Feedback Carefully

Researcher: The report says customers were completely satisfied with the delivery service. Does the evidence support that wording?
Manager: Most ratings were positive. I thought the stronger phrase made the conclusion clearer.
Researcher: It actually makes it less accurate. Some customers were pleased with the speed but frustrated by damaged packaging.
Manager: So the service was satisfying but the packaging was disappointing?
Researcher: For those respondents, yes. We should distinguish the experience from the people experiencing it. Also, this sentence says we only delivered late to rural addresses.
Manager: I meant that rural addresses were the only places with late deliveries.
Researcher: Then write that directly. 'Only delivered late' can suggest lateness was the only thing we did, which is hardly a recommendation.
Manager: Language is making our vans look worse than they are.
Researcher: Precise language will help them. We can say ninety percent arrived on time, then explain the exceptions and proposed improvements.

Manager: Would that sound defensive?
Researcher: Not if the action is clear. Acknowledging an irritating problem is more convincing than calling everything absolutely perfect. Customers remember the box they received, not the adjective we preferred in a meeting.
Manager: I'll revise the summary and keep the figures beside each claim.

Kuchli reklama sifatlari foydalimi yoki chalg‘itadimi? Ko‘rgazma dalillariga tayangan holda gapiring. 2 daqiqa fikr bildiring, keyin sherikning qarshi savoliga 30 soniyada javob bering.

Mezon: Interested/interesting, gradable sifatlar va only/almost qamrovini to‘g‘ri ajratadi. · Matndan ikki dalil keltiradi, bir qarshi fikrni tan olib javob beradi. · Belgilangan vaqtni saqlab, bugungi grammatikadan kamida ikki aniq misol ishlatadi.

Writing

Iste’molchilar blogi uchun 'Perfect kabi reklama so‘zlariga qanchalik ishonish mumkin?' mavzusida post yozing. Misol, qarshi fikr va o‘quvchiga amaliy mezon bering. 180–200 so‘z yozing.

Mezon: Reklama bahosini tekshiriladigan dalil bilan solishtiradi va muvozanatli tavsiya beradi. · Qabul qiluvchi va janrga mos murojaat/uslubni saqlab, fikrlarni mantiqan bog‘laydi. · 180–200 so‘z chegarasini saqlaydi; maqsadli grammatikani kamida ikki marta aniq qo‘llaydi.

Writing namuna — urinishdan keyin

Advertising often promises an amazing experience, but strong adjectives tell us little without evidence. I am more interested in what a service actually does than in whether a company calls it perfect.
The science exhibition provides a useful example. Visitors enjoyed the demonstrations, yet many struggled to find their way through the building. Calling the whole exhibition disappointing would ignore its strengths. Calling it absolutely wonderful would ignore the layout problem. Specific descriptions reveal what needs to change.
Of course, advertisements are designed to attract attention. Nobody expects a poster to contain an evaluation report. A lively phrase can communicate enthusiasm and help an event reach an audience. The problem begins when excitement replaces evidence or makes a limited benefit sound universal.
I suggest looking for concrete details beside the attractive language. What proportion of deliveries arrive on time? Which activities are included? What happens when a customer has a problem? These questions are more useful than arguing about whether something is truly amazing.
Businesses can benefit from precision. A realistic promise is easier to keep, and an acknowledged weakness gives customers a reason to trust improvement. Clear information may be quieter than a slogan, but it usually lasts longer.

Reading · A Question Is Not an Accusation

At a meeting about a new cycle route, several residents wanted details about deliveries and emergency access. The chair invited questions, but the first speaker asked, 'You have considered local businesses, haven't you?' The wording sounded polite, yet it also suggested that a particular answer was expected. A trader who still had concerns hesitated to respond.
Later, another resident asked, 'Could you explain how deliveries will reach the shops during construction?' That question produced a useful diagram and a clear timetable. It did not assume either competence or failure; it requested information that everyone could examine.
Indirect questions are not automatically neutral, and question tags are not automatically aggressive. Tone, context and the relationship between speakers all matter. However, the structure can influence whether a discussion invites evidence or merely seeks agreement.
The chair decided to collect written questions before the next meeting. This may help quieter residents, although it should not replace opportunities to challenge an unclear answer. The aim is a conversation in which people can ask where access will remain open and whether arrangements have been tested. A public meeting should clarify the proposal, not reward whichever participant can attach the most confident 'isn't it?' to an opinion.

Listening · Enquiring About a Training Grant

Applicant: Could you tell me whether part-time workers can apply for the training grant?
Officer: Yes, they can. The main condition concerns the course, not the number of hours they work.
Applicant: And do you know when decisions will be announced?
Officer: The panel meets on the twelfth. Applicants should receive a message within the following week.
Applicant: The website mentions employer approval. That means my manager must pay part of the fee, doesn't it?
Officer: No. Approval confirms that the proposed training is relevant. It does not create a financial obligation for the employer.
Applicant: I'm glad I checked. Could you explain where supporting documents should be uploaded?
Officer: Use the secure application portal, not ordinary email. There is a separate box for each document.
Applicant: The guidance is quite detailed, isn't it?
Officer: It is, although some applicants find the terminology difficult. We're revising the examples.
Applicant: A sample completed checklist would help me more than another paragraph of definitions.
Officer: That's useful feedback. I can send a blank checklist now. Please remember that checking eligibility does not guarantee funding; the panel still compares applications against the published criteria.
Applicant: Understood. I want to submit a complete application, not assume the outcome before anyone has assessed it.

Hi Tim,
I checked the training grant rules. Employer approval doesn't mean the company has to pay, which is a relief. Part-time staff can apply too. I'll upload my documents through the secure portal tomorrow. Could you check whether my checklist is complete before I submit it?
Thanks,
Samira

Reading · Agreement with a Condition

A residents' group is considering a shared garden, but apparent agreement hides different expectations. One member thinks the site should mainly grow vegetables. Another is thinking about a quiet seating area. Both support 'a garden', yet they may be imagining incompatible uses of the same small plot.
At the meeting, someone said, 'We don't need formal rules, do we?' Several people nodded. Later discussion revealed concerns about watering, access and the distribution of produce. Agreement with a general statement had not resolved those practical questions.
The group now distinguishes shared principles from operational decisions. Members value open access, and so does the housing manager. Some residents cannot commit to weekly duties, and neither can the caretaker. Recognising these limits is more useful than treating hesitation as a lack of community spirit.
The proposal includes a trial planting area and a separate bench. It also names a contact person for maintenance problems. This arrangement may seem less ambitious than the original sketch, but it tests whether the group can sustain basic responsibilities before expanding.
Good cooperation does not require everyone to feel equally enthusiastic about every detail. It requires people to know what they agree to, what remains undecided, and how an attractive idea will function after the first planting afternoon.

Listening · Reacting to a Flexible Work Proposal

Colleague: I think the flexible-start proposal could help with travel. I'm thinking about starting half an hour earlier.
Partner: So am I, although I want to check the customer coverage first.
Colleague: We aren't reducing opening hours, are we?
Partner: No. The office keeps the same hours. Individuals choose different starting times within the agreed limits.
Colleague: I don't want clients to find nobody available.
Partner: Neither do I. That's why the manager is asking each team for a coverage plan.
Colleague: The proposal sounds fair, but some roles have less flexibility.
Partner: Yes. I see that problem. I'm seeing the manager tomorrow to discuss how those roles might benefit in another way.
Colleague: Perhaps they could choose preferred break times instead.
Partner: Possibly. We shouldn't call the system equal simply because the same email goes to everyone.
Colleague: You haven't submitted your plan yet, have you?
Partner: No. I want to understand the limits before promising a schedule. Flexibility is useful, but it isn't a substitute for coordination.
Colleague: Agreed. Let's compare our draft times today. If they leave a gap at reception, we'll adjust them before the meeting rather than ask customers to admire our flexibility from a locked doorway.

Writing namuna — urinishdan keyin

Dear Training Grants Officer,
I am writing to clarify the application requirements for your current training grant. I work part-time and understand that this does not prevent me from applying, provided the course meets the published criteria.
Could you confirm whether employer approval only establishes the relevance of the course? I would also appreciate clarification of the final date for uploading supporting documents through the secure portal. The panel meets on the twelfth, but I do not want to confuse that date with the submission deadline.
I am considering a course related to my present role and would like to prepare a complete application. A sample checklist with brief explanations would be particularly useful for applicants unfamiliar with the terminology. It could reduce incomplete submissions without adding another long section to the guidance.
Yours faithfully,
Samira Usmanova

Reading · Editing a Community Report

The first draft of a neighbourhood survey declared that everyone was delighted with the new park. An editor checked the underlying responses and found a more balanced picture. Most respondents liked the planting, but several were concerned about lighting. The collection of comments was valuable; it was not proof of universal satisfaction.

The editor also changed a sentence claiming that the council had only improved the central entrance. The intended meaning was that this entrance was the only area improved, not that improvement was the council's sole activity. Moving one word made the claim easier to understand.

A photograph showed a beautiful new wooden bench, yet the caption called it 'completely comfortable'. Comfort depends partly on the user, so the editor replaced that judgement with dimensions and a description of its back support. The resulting caption was less enthusiastic but more informative.

Before publication, the team asked whether residents could identify which findings were observed and which were interpretations. Several readers requested a simple table. The final report included one, alongside quotations representing different views. Precision did not remove personality from the report. It helped readers see whose experience was being described and where the evidence ended, which is essential when a document may influence the next round of spending.

Listening · Reviewing a Course Advertisement

Coordinator: The draft says our course is perfect for everyone. That sounds welcoming, doesn't it?
Tutor: It does, but it promises too much. Some applicants need an advanced course, while ours introduces basic design skills.
Coordinator: Could you suggest a more accurate description?
Tutor: Say who it is intended for and what participants practise. The list of activities is clear, and each task has a practical outcome.
Coordinator: Nobody needs previous experience, do they?
Tutor: No, but everyone needs access to a suitable device. We should state that beside the booking button.
Coordinator: I'm thinking about adding a sample task. I think that would explain the level better than several adjectives.
Tutor: So do I. Also, the phrase 'only beginners receive feedback' is wrong. All participants receive feedback; beginners are simply our main audience.
Coordinator: Good catch. Do you know whether the sample files are ready?
Tutor: Yes, they are. I have tested them with three volunteers, and two found the first instruction confusing.
Coordinator: Then let's revise it before publishing.
Tutor: Exactly. An inviting advertisement can still be precise. We want learners to arrive with realistic expectations, not spend the first session discovering which parts of 'perfect for everyone' did not include them.

Speaking

Mahalla hisobotini tekshiruvchi sifatida uchta noaniq iborani tuzatib, o‘zgarish sababini himoya qiling. 2 daqiqa fikr bildiring, keyin sherikning qarshi savoliga 30 soniyada javob bering.

Mezon: Ega-fe’l mosligi, ravish qamrovi va bilvosita savoldan aniq foydalanadi. · Matndan ikki dalil keltiradi, bir qarshi fikrni tan olib javob beradi. · Belgilangan vaqtni saqlab, bugungi grammatikadan kamida ikki aniq misol ishlatadi.

Writing

Mezon: Reklama jozibasi va aniq kutishlar muvozanatini kamida ikki misolda ko‘rsatadi. · Qabul qiluvchi va janrga mos murojaat/uslubni saqlab, fikrlarni mantiqan bog‘laydi. · 180–200 so‘z chegarasini saqlaydi; maqsadli grammatikani kamida ikki marta aniq qo‘llaydi.

Writing namuna — urinishdan keyin

A useful course advertisement should help a learner make a decision, not merely produce excitement. I would like to see the intended level, the practical requirements and an example of the work before reading that a course is perfect for everyone.
A sample task can communicate difficulty more clearly than a label such as beginner-friendly. It shows the kind of instructions learners will meet and the outcome they are expected to produce. However, one sample should not be presented as a complete picture of the course.
Requirements also need to be visible. If everyone needs a suitable device, that information belongs near the booking button. Hiding it in a long document may lead people to pay for something they cannot access properly.
Finally, the advertisement should explain feedback. Will a tutor respond individually, will peers discuss the work, or will learners compare their answers with a model? These are different experiences, and none should be implied without being provided.
Some people argue that detailed information makes advertising dull. I disagree. Clear examples can be engaging, while realistic promises build trust. A course does not need to suit everybody to be valuable; it needs to serve its actual learners well.

The evening language centre drafted an advertisement saying, 'Everyone becomes confident after six lessons.' A tutor objected that nobody had measured confidence consistently. The previous class had completed a short survey, but only twelve of its twenty learners responded. Most respondents said they felt more willing to speak. That was encouraging, yet it did not establish a result for everyone who enrolled.

The draft also described the classroom as a spacious modern room. In fact, it was a small bright room with a large shared table. Some learners enjoyed the close arrangement; others wanted more personal space for writing. The administrator suggested using a photograph and giving the maximum group size instead of relying on a broad adjective.

The revised advertisement promises opportunities to practise in a group of up to ten. It reports the survey as feedback from twelve respondents and avoids claiming that all future learners will have the same experience. Precise wording may sound less dramatic, but it helps applicants decide whether the course fits their needs. Accuracy does not require hiding positive feedback; it requires describing whose feedback it is.

The tutor proposes a further check before publication. Two people unfamiliar with the centre will read the revised advertisement and explain what they think it promises. One may interpret 'up to ten' as a guarantee that ten learners will always attend; another may assume that a practice opportunity means individual correction after every sentence. Their interpretations will help the centre identify remaining ambiguity.

The centre will also explain what it can verify about progress. Tutors keep examples of learners' spoken and written work, but the examples come from different tasks and involve different amounts of support. They cannot be combined into a fair comparison merely because each page has a date. The tutor wants the advertisement to link to a description of the teaching approach rather than to an unsupported ranking of past learners.

A donor offers to pay for a more dramatic headline. The administrator thanks her but keeps the narrower wording. More enquiries would be welcome only if prospective learners understand the service. The centre plans to record common questions from applicants and compare them with later feedback. If the same misunderstanding appears before and after enrolment, the description will need another revision, even if the enrolment numbers initially look impressive.

Reading · Keeping a Library Open During Repairs

Next month, builders will be replacing the library roof, but the building will not close completely. Staff will be serving readers from the ground-floor rooms, and a temporary desk will be operating beside the side entrance. The upstairs study area will not be receiving visitors during the work.
The manager argues that partial access is better than a full closure. Students will still be collecting reserved books, and families will be attending a reduced programme of activities. However, readers who depend on a quiet workspace may gain little from a noisy ground floor. Calling the library open should not imply that every usual service remains available.
The published timetable therefore identifies both operating hours and likely periods of noise. Contractors will be carrying materials through the courtyard before ten, while delivery vehicles will be using a separate gate. Volunteers will not be directing visitors through the work area.
Some members want a guarantee that the timetable will never change. The manager cannot reasonably provide that, since hidden damage may affect the schedule. Instead, a daily notice will explain any revision and offer alternative study locations. The plan treats continuity as a practical effort to preserve access, not as a promise that repairs can occur without anyone noticing.

Listening · A Station During Platform Works

Presenter: What will passengers notice during the station improvements?
Planner: For the next fortnight, workers will be extending platform two. Trains will be using platforms one and three, and staff will be helping passengers at the main entrance.
Presenter: Some commuters worry that the temporary arrangement will be confusing.
Planner: It may be unfamiliar, so we will be displaying the same colour-coded information online and inside the station. We won't be relying only on announcements, which some passengers cannot hear clearly.
Presenter: Will the cafe area become a waiting room?
Planner: Part of it will. The cafe will still be serving customers, but half the seats will be available without a purchase.
Presenter: That detail matters. People may otherwise assume they need to buy something.
Planner: Exactly. The signs will state it plainly. We also won't be sending wheelchair users along the narrow temporary footbridge; an accessible route is available beside the entrance.
Presenter: Can you promise the works will feel effortless?
Planner: No. Transfers may take longer. We can promise clear information and staff assistance, not pretend construction is invisible.
Presenter: That sounds less dramatic than 'business as usual'.
Planner: It is more useful. A realistic explanation helps people plan, whereas a reassuring slogan may leave them surprised at the platform.

Reading · Preparing a Small Archive for Opening

The local history archive will welcome its first visitors in June. By opening day, the team will have catalogued the donated photographs and installed protective covers on the most fragile documents. During the opening week, volunteers will be demonstrating the search system rather than offering unrestricted access to every box.

What will researchers be doing while the final records are checked? They will be using a temporary index and requesting material through staff. This may seem slow, but an incomplete catalogue can cause greater delays if visitors expect everything to be immediately available.

The director has separated physical readiness from intellectual completeness. By June, the reading room will have passed its safety inspection, yet interpretation of some documents will continue for months. A collection can be accessible before every historical question has been answered.

Some supporters want the opening announcement to say the archive is finished. The team prefers 'ready for a first stage of public use'. That wording acknowledges progress without disguising the work ahead. It also encourages families to contribute missing names and dates. The public opening is therefore a milestone in an ongoing process, not a ribbon-cutting ceremony that magically turns every uncertain photograph into a fully explained piece of history.

Listening · Checking the Festival Schedule

Coordinator: What will the technical team be doing at nine on opening morning?
Engineer: We'll be testing the microphones. By then, we will have installed the main speakers, but the sound check needs an empty square.
Coordinator: Will stallholders be unloading at the same time?
Engineer: Not in the central area. They will have completed those deliveries by eight thirty under the current plan.

Coordinator: One trader has requested a later slot because his driver covers another route first.
Engineer: We can discuss a side entrance. The deadline exists to keep vehicles away from the sound cables, not to punish someone for asking.
Coordinator: That's helpful. Will you be available for small changes during the programme?
Engineer: One technician will be monitoring the stage all day. The others will be working on the indoor sessions.
Coordinator: By noon, we will have welcomed several hundred visitors, so the information desk needs a clear contact list.
Engineer: Agreed. Please distinguish urgent faults from ordinary requests. A broken microphone needs immediate action; a speaker wanting slightly more dramatic entrance music can wait.
Coordinator: I'll make that distinction in the briefing.
Engineer: Good. A timetable should coordinate different jobs, not make every request look equally urgent simply because it arrives during a busy morning.

Writing namuna — urinishdan keyin

Dear Library Manager,
Thank you for explaining how services will continue during the roof repairs. I appreciate that staff will be lending reserved books downstairs rather than closing the building entirely.
However, I normally use the upstairs study room to prepare for examinations. Could you confirm which periods are likely to be particularly noisy and whether an alternative quiet room will be available nearby? A list of suitable locations would help students plan before the work begins.
By the start of the repairs, many readers will have arranged their study schedules, so early information would be valuable. I also suggest placing the daily update beside the reservation desk as well as online. This would support visitors who do not regularly check the website and reduce repeated questions for staff.
Yours sincerely,
Dina Rustamova

Reading · A Deadline That Does Not Mean Completion

A town has promised to publish an online map of accessible public buildings by September. Will the survey team have visited every site by then? No. The current schedule covers sixty of the ninety buildings, and the remaining inspections require additional funding. The first release will therefore be useful but incomplete.

The project manager wants unvisited sites marked as 'not yet assessed', rather than left blank. A blank space could suggest either that no barrier exists or that the building has been forgotten. Neither interpretation would be reliable. By September, the team will not have verified information supplied informally by every building owner.

Some councillors fear that visible gaps will make the project look unsuccessful. Disability advocates disagree: knowing where information is missing is itself valuable. They also want the map to distinguish a step-free entrance from full access throughout a building. One positive feature does not answer every visitor's question.

The deadline should produce a transparent first version, not an appearance of completeness. Later updates can add verified detail and record changes. A map that admits its limits helps users plan; a polished map that hides them may send someone to a destination they cannot actually enter or use comfortably.

Listening · Before the Product Demonstration

Client: Will your team have finished the booking system by Friday's demonstration?
Developer: We will have completed the calendar and confirmation messages, but we won't have tested the payment function thoroughly enough for public use.
Client: The invitation says people can try the new service.
Developer: They can try a demonstration with sample bookings. We need to distinguish that from accepting real payments.
Client: Will the security review have been completed?
Developer: Not by Friday. The external reviewer starts next week. I don't want a confident presentation to suggest checks have happened when they haven't.
Client: Could we hide the payment button and explain the limited scope at the beginning?
Developer: Yes. That would make the session useful without misleading participants. We can ask them about navigation and the clarity of messages.
Client: Some guests may be disappointed.
Developer: Possibly, but discovering a limit during a demonstration is better than discovering it after someone has paid. Their feedback can still improve the system.
Client: Then I'll revise the invitation today.
Developer: Thank you. A deadline can define what we are ready to show; it should not pressure us into calling unfinished work complete. The most valuable outcome on Friday may be a clear list of improvements rather than immediate applause.

Speaking

Xaritani muddatida qisman nashr qilish tarafdori yoki qarshisi bo‘ling; noma’lum ma’lumotni qanday belgilang? 2 daqiqa fikr bildiring, keyin sherikning qarshi savoliga 30 soniyada javob bering.

Mezon: Will…have + V3 savoli va won't have + V3 cheklovlarini aniq muddat bilan qo‘llaydi. · Matndan ikki dalil keltiradi, bir qarshi fikrni tan olib javob beradi. · Belgilangan vaqtni saqlab, bugungi grammatikadan kamida ikki aniq misol ishlatadi.

Writing

Texnologiya forumi uchun 'To‘liq tugamagan xizmatni namoyish qilish mumkinmi?' mavzusida post yozing. Foyda, xavf va halol chegaralash shartlarini muhokama qiling. 180–200 so‘z yozing.

Mezon: Demo va real foydalanishni ajratib, kamida ikki oshkoralik shartini beradi. · Qabul qiluvchi va janrga mos murojaat/uslubni saqlab, fikrlarni mantiqan bog‘laydi. · 180–200 so‘z chegarasini saqlaydi; maqsadli grammatikani kamida ikki marta aniq qo‘llaydi.

Writing namuna — urinishdan keyin

A service does not always need to be complete before people can give feedback. I support demonstrations of unfinished work, provided the limits are visible and nobody mistakes a trial for a tested product.
The booking system illustrates this. Visitors can comment on the calendar and confirmation messages even though payment testing is incomplete. Their reactions may reveal confusion before the developers invest time in the wrong design.
However, the invitation must explain what participants can actually do. If it promises a new service without qualification, people may reasonably expect real transactions. Hiding an unfinished button is helpful, but an explanation at the start is also necessary. Sample bookings should be clearly labelled, and no claim should imply that an external security review has already happened.
Some organisers worry that these limits will make the event disappointing. That is possible, yet disappointment is less damaging than misplaced trust. By the demonstration date, the team may not have completed every feature, but it can still have prepared focused questions and a feedback process.
I would judge the event by what the team learns and communicates, not by applause alone. A useful demonstration makes the next version better while keeping promises realistic.

Reading · The Training Programme's Halfway Review

A workplace training programme has reached its planning stage, and the organisers are defining what learners can reasonably achieve. What will participants have produced by the halfway review? Each will have completed one small project and received written feedback. They will not be expected to master every tool in the software.

Will tutors be observing practice during the review week? Yes, they will. The observations are intended to reveal where instructions need improvement, not merely to identify individual mistakes. If several people struggle at the same step, the course design may be part of the problem.

The programme manager has resisted a suggestion to count logins as the main measure of engagement. A login shows access, but it cannot establish understanding. Equally, a learner who studies downloaded materials may appear inactive on the platform while working carefully offline.

The review will therefore combine project evidence, brief learner explanations and tutor observations. By the final meeting, the team will have compared these sources and identified changes for the next group. This approach requires more judgement than a simple activity chart, but it avoids treating visible clicks as learning itself. The aim is demonstrable progress, including an honest account of what learners still need to practise.

Listening · Questions Before a Street Survey

Resident: What will your team have checked by the public meeting?

Researcher: We will have counted traffic at six locations and compared morning and evening conditions.

Resident: Will you be interviewing people outside the shops too?

Researcher: Yes, we will. We also plan telephone conversations with residents who cannot attend in person.

Resident: Will you have solved the parking problem by then?

Researcher: No, we won't. The meeting is for presenting evidence and discussing options, not announcing a completed design.

Resident: What will you have learned about deliveries?

Researcher: We expect to have recorded their usual times and the space they need. We should then be able to distinguish regular requirements from occasional exceptions.

Resident: Some neighbours think the decision has already been made.

Researcher: Then we need to explain the process more clearly. Questions should influence the options, not simply decorate a finished proposal.

Resident: Will you be publishing the raw counts?

Researcher: Yes, we will, with notes explaining when and where they were collected. A number without context can create another argument rather than settle one.

Resident: That would help. I may disagree with the recommendation, but I want to see how you reached it before deciding whether the evidence supports it.

Hi Omar,
By the review, we'll have finished one small project, not mastered every tool. That feels manageable. Will you be practising on Tuesday? I will, and we could compare our explanations afterwards. I'll ask the tutor how offline work is recorded so our effort doesn't disappear from the chart.
Best,
Zebo

Reading · The Launch That Changed Shape

The team was going to launch a complete neighbourhood history website in May. Volunteers believed they would have enough time to translate every interview before publication. By April, however, several recordings still lacked permission for public use, and translation was taking longer than expected.

The revised plan separates a first release from the complete collection. By launch day, the team will have checked permissions for twenty interviews and prepared summaries in two languages. During the first month, translators will be working on longer transcripts while editors collect corrections from families.

Some volunteers feel the smaller release breaks the original promise. Others argue that publishing unapproved material would be a more serious failure. The coordinator has acknowledged the earlier overconfidence and explained why the timetable changed. This does not erase the disappointment, but it makes the decision open to scrutiny.

By the time the full collection appears, the team hopes to have improved both its records and its process for obtaining consent. Meanwhile, the website will clearly identify which material is available and which is still being prepared. A changed plan is not automatically evidence of poor commitment. Sometimes it shows that new information has been taken seriously rather than forced into an unrealistic deadline.

Listening · A Sports Centre's Revised Opening

Reporter: You were going to reopen the sports centre this weekend. What changed?
Manager: The inspection found a drainage problem near the changing rooms. We had expected the final checks to be straightforward, but the repair needs another week.
Reporter: What will users be able to do meanwhile?
Manager: Outdoor classes will be running as scheduled. By Monday, we will have moved the booked indoor sessions to two partner venues.
Reporter: Will every user receive the same arrangement?
Manager: No. Swimming sessions cannot transfer to a hall, so those bookings will be refunded. We need to explain the differences clearly.
Reporter: Some members say you promised the building would be ready.
Manager: We did announce a date, and we should have made the remaining inspection condition clearer. I understand their frustration.
Reporter: By the time the centre opens, will the drainage work have been checked again?
Manager: Yes. During that check, contractors will still be finishing minor decoration elsewhere, but public routes will be complete.
Reporter: So some work may continue after opening?
Manager: Only outside user areas. We will publish the details rather than call everything finished. People need to know what affects their visit, not receive another broad assurance that later needs a footnote.

Writing namuna — urinishdan keyin

Dear Programme Manager,
Thank you for clarifying the expectations for the halfway review. I understand that each participant will have completed one small project and received written feedback by that stage, while tutors will be observing our practice during the review week.
Could you explain how work completed offline will be considered? I regularly use downloaded materials, so my login record may not reflect the time spent studying. I can provide drafts and a brief explanation of the decisions made in my project.
I was going to focus mainly on the platform activity chart, but your message has helped me understand the wider evidence required. I suggest allowing every learner to submit a short process note alongside the finished work. This would make progress visible without treating online activity as the only sign of engagement.
Yours sincerely,
Zebo Nurmatova

Reading · Planning the Final Month of a Pilot

A community transport pilot is approaching its final month. At the beginning, organisers thought they would be ready to recommend a permanent service by this point. In practice, two unusual festival weekends produced demand that may not represent ordinary travel patterns. The evaluation needs to separate those peaks from routine use.
During the final month, drivers will be recording missed requests as well as completed journeys. By the last review meeting, analysts will have compared weekdays, weekends and special events. They will not have enough evidence to predict every seasonal change, and the report should state that limitation.
Supporters argue that the service already helps people without cars. Critics question whether its cost is sustainable. Both issues matter, so a single count of passengers will not settle the debate. The team also needs information about journey purpose, alternative transport and the consequences of an unavailable ride.
By the time a decision is made, residents should have access to the findings and a chance to challenge the interpretation. The pilot was intended to inform a choice, not make that choice inevitable. Continuing, revising or ending it could each be reasonable, depending on the evidence. A useful evaluation explains the conditions behind its recommendation rather than treating activity itself as proof of success.

Listening · The Final Exhibition Briefing

Curator: By Thursday evening, we will have installed all the objects in the main gallery. On Friday morning, staff will be testing lighting and visitor routes.
Director: Will the audio guides have been checked by then?
Curator: Yes, but we won't have translated the additional interviews. Those will follow next month, as the updated notice explains.
Director: We were going to include them at opening. Are visitors likely to feel misled?
Curator: They might if we kept the original wording. We have changed the website and contacted booked groups. The main exhibition is complete; the supplementary material is a later addition.
Director: What will volunteers be doing during the first weekend?
Curator: They will be noting repeated questions and places where people hesitate. That feedback may reveal unclear labels.
Director: Good. By the time we review the opening, I want more than attendance figures.
Curator: We will have collected comments from visitors and staff, including people who leave early. Their experience matters too.
Director: Then let's state the distinction between completed installation and continuing improvement in the briefing.
Curator: Agreed. Opening the doors marks readiness to welcome people, not the end of learning about how they use the space. A gallery can be carefully prepared and still benefit from its first audience.

Writing namuna — urinishdan keyin

A busy pilot project is not automatically a successful one. Before deciding whether a service should continue, we need to ask what it was intended to achieve and whether the evidence answers that question.
The community transport trial shows the problem. Festival weekends attracted many passengers, but those peaks may not represent normal demand. By the final review, the team should have compared ordinary days with special events rather than combining everything into one encouraging total.
Missed requests matter too. Completed journeys show what the service provided, whereas unavailable rides reveal needs it could not meet. Information about alternative transport would also help explain how much difference the pilot made to people's lives.
Of course, collecting evidence costs time and money. We cannot postpone every decision until every uncertainty disappears. Nevertheless, a report can acknowledge limits while still offering a practical recommendation. It might support a smaller route, different operating hours or a further seasonal test.
I would call the evaluation successful if residents can understand why the recommendation follows from the findings. Continuing the service is not the only acceptable result. A well-explained revision may serve the community better than keeping an impressive but unsuitable project unchanged.

120 daqiqalik uy vazifasining reading/listening qismi: 35 daqiqa; qo‘shimcha vaqt emas. 3 daqiqa taxmin; 12 daqiqa uzluksiz o‘qish; 15 daqiqa olti javob va dalil; 5 daqiqa tekshirish va bitta javobni yaxshilash.

The reading festival opens on Saturday at ten. By Friday evening, the volunteers will have arranged the chairs and checked the public routes. At nine on Saturday, two librarians will be explaining the booking system while another volunteer welcomes authors at the station. The organisers were going to print a programme for every visitor, but several sessions have changed. They will instead display a dated programme at each entrance and offer a short printed version on request.

One organiser has suggested announcing that every session will start exactly on time. The coordinator refuses: visiting authors may be delayed, and a promise cannot remove that uncertainty. She prefers to state how changes will be communicated. A volunteer will update the entrance boards and explain alternatives if a session moves.

By the end of the festival, the team will have collected attendance figures and a record of changes. During the final meeting, they will be comparing the two. A full room may show popularity, but the change record may explain why another room was unexpectedly empty. Looking at both will make next year's planning more useful.

The team will rehearse the update procedure on Friday. One volunteer will pretend that an author is delayed, and another will follow the signs as if arriving for the first time. The exercise will test whether the website, entrance boards and spoken explanation agree. It will not predict every possible delay, but it can expose a contradiction while there is still time to fix it.

The coordinator has also reserved a small quiet room. It is intended for visitors who need a break, not as an unannounced substitute for a cancelled session. If it is used for another purpose, that change must be explained. Otherwise a solution for one group could remove a facility another group was relying on.

Afterwards, volunteers will separate events they observed from explanations they inferred. For example, seeing people leave a queue does not establish that they disliked the author. They may have been following a changed room notice or collecting a child. The review will combine the observation log with short visitor comments. Organisers will describe uncertain explanations as possibilities, while using confirmed problems to assign practical actions. The next festival should benefit from the record rather than simply inherit a confident sentence saying that this year's event went well.

Reading · A Job Title Is Not a Job Description

A youth organisation is recruiting a communications assistant. Its first advertisement describes the ideal applicant as creative, confident and flexible. Those adjectives sound positive, but they leave practical questions unanswered. Does flexible mean willing to change working hours, able to use different software, or comfortable switching between tasks? An attractive label is not an observable responsibility.
The revised advertisement states what the assistant does: writes short updates, checks information with colleagues and prepares accessible event notices. It also distinguishes essential skills from skills that can be learned after appointment. The successful applicant is a member of a team, not an independent expert in every form of communication.
Some staff worry that concrete descriptions will attract people who lack ambition. The recruitment lead disagrees. Clear verbs give applicants a better basis for judging their experience, while broad adjectives may reward confidence more than ability. Someone can be a careful writer without being the loudest person in an interview.
The team will still discuss attitude and willingness to learn. However, it will ask for examples rather than accept self-description alone. The change does not make personality irrelevant. It prevents a handful of fashionable words from standing in for the actual work and helps both applicants and interviewers understand what a fair assessment should examine.

Listening · What Does a 'Quiet Workspace' Mean?

Member: Your shared office is advertised as a quiet workspace. Is that a rule or just a description of the atmosphere?
Host: It's a description, but I see why the distinction matters. People work here, and short conversations are normal.
Member: I edit audio, so quiet has a fairly specific meaning for me. Yesterday two people held a video meeting at the next desk.
Host: The meeting booths are usually available, but one was out of service. The advertisement doesn't explain that temporary limitation.
Member: I don't expect complete silence everywhere. I need to know where focused work is possible and which activities belong in the common area.
Host: We could replace the general claim with separate descriptions of each zone. The rear room is a silent work area. The central tables are a collaborative space, and calls belong in the booths.
Member: That would help. A place can be welcoming without being suitable for every task.
Host: Agreed. I'll add the booth status to the booking page as well. I don't want the word quiet to carry a promise the room cannot consistently meet.
Member: Thank you. I'm happy to use the rear room if the expectations are clear. My headphones are useful, but they aren't a substitute for accurate information.

Writing namuna — urinishdan keyin

Hi Maya,
The shared office is changing its room descriptions after my noisy visit. I'm pleased because quiet means different things to different people. The rear room is for silent work, while calls belong in booths. I'll book the rear room next time and check whether the booths are available.
Best,
Nodir

Reading · When a Bag Becomes Evidence

A railway station's lost-property office receives hundreds of objects each month. Staff can identify a suitcase more easily when its owner provides distinctive details than when the owner simply calls it expensive. A description such as 'a small black bag with a broken silver zip' gives useful evidence; a claim about value does not establish ownership.
The office has changed its online form to reflect this. Applicants first name an item, then describe the item with specific features. They are asked about contents without being shown every detail in the public listing. That protects against someone claiming a bag after reading its complete inventory online.
Some passengers find the questions excessive, particularly when they are already anxious. Staff therefore explain why a piece of information matters instead of requesting more information indefinitely. The aim is enough evidence to make a reasonable match, not an impossible test of memory.
The system also distinguishes a passenger's property from equipment belonging to the station. Umbrellas, for example, may look identical but carry different ownership marks. A clear record helps staff return the right object without assuming that the most confident claimant is the rightful owner. In this setting, articles, plurals and possessive forms are small language choices with practical consequences.

Listening · Ordering Supplies Without Confusion

Assistant: The workshop order says we need paper, two papers and six glass containers. I think someone combined several notes.
Coordinator: You're right. We need a pack of drawing paper and two copies of the safety document. 'Two papers' is ambiguous here.
Assistant: And are the containers made of glass, or do you mean six drinking glasses?
Coordinator: Six glass jars for storing brushes. They need wide openings, not handles.
Assistant: I'll write that clearly. The supplier's assistant asked whether the teachers' materials should be packed separately from the students' materials.
Coordinator: Yes. The teachers' box contains demonstration tools. Each student's pack contains a notebook and a pencil, but no cutting equipment.
Assistant: Some people might say these details are obvious.
Coordinator: They are obvious to us because we discussed the session. The person packing the order only sees the words. A small grammatical ambiguity can become a large box of the wrong things.
Assistant: Then I'll send a numbered list with quantities and a short purpose for each item.
Coordinator: Good. Ask for confirmation before dispatch. Precise wording is not unnecessary formality when somebody else must turn a message into physical objects. It saves both their time and ours, and prevents the brushes from arriving with perfectly attractive but entirely unsuitable drinking glasses.

Writing namuna — urinishdan keyin

Dear Workspace Manager,
Thank you for proposing clearer descriptions of the office's different work areas. During my recent visit, a video meeting at the neighbouring desk made audio editing difficult. I understand that one of the meeting booths was unavailable, but that information was not visible when I booked.
The distinction between a silent rear room and a collaborative central area would help members choose an appropriate space. Could you also display the number of working booths on the booking page and indicate where calls should take place when a booth is closed?
I do not expect silence throughout the building. My concern is that the description should match the service available on the day. Clear information about the rooms and their uses would support both focused work and necessary conversation.
Yours sincerely,
Nodir Aliyev

Reading · Whose Design Is It?

A college team has produced a poster for a community event. One student collected photographs, another developed the layout, and a third checked the text. When the poster appeared online, the caption named only the person who uploaded it. The others felt that their work had become invisible.
There is no simple rule that every contribution deserves identical credit. Choosing a font and spending several days editing photographs are different tasks. However, there is a clear reason to describe contributions accurately rather than allow the final uploader's name to stand for everyone. The team has a shared folder, but shared access does not settle authorship.
The students now keep a short contribution record. Each person describes their own work, and the group checks the descriptions together. This helps them notice both visible design work and less visible tasks such as obtaining permission to use an image.
Some classmates worry that recording contributions encourages competition. It could, if the record became a scoreboard. Used carefully, it does the opposite: it gives members language for recognising each other's work. The final caption now names the team and links to a brief account of responsibilities. Nobody needs to claim the whole poster in order to receive fair acknowledgement for a meaningful part of it.

Listening · Sharing a Workshop Kit

Organiser: There are three tool kits in the cupboard, but only one of them belongs to our project. The other two are the college's.
Volunteer: Which one is ours?
Organiser: The blue one with a numbered label. It has a complete list inside the lid.
Volunteer: Someone has taken a screwdriver from the red kit. I assumed everything here was available to everyone.
Organiser: That's an understandable assumption, but shared storage isn't the same as shared ownership. We need to return it and explain the mix-up.
Volunteer: Do we have enough equipment for Saturday without borrowing theirs?
Organiser: We have most of what we need. There isn't a long extension cable in our kit, so I'll request one formally.
Volunteer: Could we label the shelves as well as the boxes? Nobody should have to remember this conversation to find the right equipment.
Organiser: Good suggestion. Each project can have its own marked space, with a separate area for items everyone may borrow.
Volunteer: That would also help new volunteers avoid feeling blamed for unclear instructions.
Organiser: Exactly. Clear boundaries protect cooperation. They aren't a sign that we distrust each other; they prevent an innocent assumption from becoming a missing tool and an unnecessary argument between two otherwise helpful teams.

Speaking

Guruh posterida kredit qanday taqsimlanishi kerak? Ko‘rinadigan va ko‘rinmaydigan hissalarni farqlang. 2 daqiqa fikr bildiring, keyin sherikning qarshi savoliga 30 soniyada javob bering.

Mezon: Own/ours/theirs va each other ishoralarini noaniqliksiz qo‘llab, there is/are bilan holatni aytadi. · Matndan ikki dalil keltiradi, bir qarshi fikrni tan olib javob beradi. · Belgilangan vaqtni saqlab, bugungi grammatikadan kamida ikki aniq misol ishlatadi.

Writing

Talabalar forumida 'Guruh ishida hammani bir xil qayd etish adolatlimi?' mavzusida post yozing. Poster misoli, qarshi fikr va amaliy kelishuv taklifini kiriting. 180–200 so‘z yozing.

Mezon: Hissa qaydining foyda va xavfini muhokama qilib, aniq kredit tartibini tavsiya qiladi. · Qabul qiluvchi va janrga mos murojaat/uslubni saqlab, fikrlarni mantiqan bog‘laydi. · 180–200 so‘z chegarasini saqlaydi; maqsadli grammatikani kamida ikki marta aniq qo‘llaydi.

Writing namuna — urinishdan keyin

Equal recognition sounds fair, but group members do not always contribute in the same way. I would name the team as a whole and then describe responsibilities where that information is useful.
The poster example shows why. The student who uploaded the finished design received credit, although others supplied photographs, arranged the layout and checked the text. Uploading was necessary, but it did not represent the entire project. A caption naming only the uploader gave readers a misleading picture.
A contribution record could help, provided it is not used as a competitive scorecard. Some essential work is difficult to measure. Obtaining permission for an image may take several messages but leave no visible mark on the poster. Counting only obvious design changes would overlook that effort.
I suggest agreeing on credit before publication. Each member can describe their work, and the group can check the wording together. If responsibilities overlap, the description can say so rather than force a false division.
Critics may argue that this creates unnecessary administration. For a very small task, a shared team credit may be enough. However, when a project affects portfolios or public recognition, a short, accurate explanation is worth the effort.

Reading · A Kitchen Changes Its Routine

A community kitchen serves lunch four days a week. Volunteers usually estimate portions from previous attendance, but this month they are weighing leftovers to understand how much food is wasted. The coordinator stresses that the exercise examines the system, not the generosity of individual cooks.
The new instructions are brief: record the number of meals, weigh unused food separately from unavoidable scraps, and note unusual circumstances. Do not change portion sizes merely to make the figures look better. A lower waste total means little if visitors leave hungry.
One volunteer questions whether the measurements create extra work without changing decisions. That concern is reasonable. The kitchen already has a busy routine, and collecting data is not an achievement by itself. The coordinator has therefore identified a specific decision: whether smaller initial servings, with easy second helpings, reduce waste while meeting visitors' needs.
During the trial, staff are also asking whether people feel comfortable requesting more. Some may avoid doing so because they do not want to appear demanding. The team will compare the numbers with those comments before adjusting the routine permanently. Let's measure what matters, the coordinator says, rather than encourage everyone to celebrate a tidy spreadsheet while the actual lunch becomes less satisfying.

Listening · Temporary Checks at a Bicycle Hire Desk

Supervisor: We normally inspect returned bicycles at the end of each hour. This week, we're checking the brakes immediately because several riders reported a problem with one batch.
Assistant: Does that mean every bicycle is unsafe?
Supervisor: No. It means we are investigating a specific pattern. Please explain that accurately instead of alarming customers or dismissing their concerns.
Assistant: What should I record?
Supervisor: Write the bicycle number and the rider's description. Don't diagnose the fault yourself. Ask the technician to inspect it, and keep it out of circulation until that check is complete.
Assistant: Some customers are asking whether they can use another bicycle straight away.
Supervisor: Yes, if a checked one is available. We don't need to stop the whole service while we examine a small group, but we do need to trace those bicycles carefully.
Assistant: Let's put the temporary procedure beside the ordinary return checklist.
Supervisor: Good idea. Mark it with this week's date so nobody mistakes it for a permanent change.
Assistant: Then new staff can see what usually happens and what we are doing differently now.
Supervisor: Exactly. A temporary response works best when its purpose and limits are clear. Otherwise, yesterday's emergency note can quietly become next year's unexplained rule.

Writing namuna — urinishdan keyin

Hi Umid,
The kitchen is weighing leftovers this month. I think the trial could help, but smaller portions shouldn't leave people hungry. We usually count meals; now we also need visitors' comments. I'll help record feedback on Friday and ask whether everyone feels comfortable requesting more food.
See you,
Saida

Reading · The Delivery Map Needs Better Questions

A small bookshop is reviewing its local delivery route. Orders are increasing, and the owner believes the driver is spending too long between stops. The driver disagrees: the route crosses a busy market street, and access changes during unloading hours. A map showing distance alone cannot explain the delay.

The review begins with better questions. Who prepares the parcels before departure? Which entrance does each building use? How long does the driver wait outside locked courtyards? These questions examine the process rather than assume that the person driving is inefficient.

For one week, the driver is recording arrival times and waiting reasons. The shop assistant is checking addresses before parcels leave the store. Early notes reveal that several customers give the main street address although deliveries enter through a side lane behind the building. Clear directions may save more time than a shorter line on the map.

The owner still needs to control costs, and the records do not prove that every delay is unavoidable. However, they make the discussion more specific. A useful route review considers where people move, when access is possible and how instructions are communicated. It does not treat the fastest theoretical journey as a fair measure of somebody's actual working day.

Listening · A Visitor Information Desk Reviews Its Signs

Coordinator: Why are people still asking how to reach the workshop room? There are signs at the entrance.
Volunteer: They're asking where to turn after the stairs, not how to enter the building. The sign near the landing points across the corridor, but the room is behind a fire door.
Coordinator: Who checks that door during events?
Volunteer: The caretaker. It stays closed, and visitors assume the area beyond it is private.
Coordinator: How many people have asked this morning?
Volunteer: Seven. I walked the route with two of them and noticed that the room number disappears from view after the first corner.
Coordinator: So we need another sign on the landing?
Volunteer: Yes, and clearer wording about passing through the door. We should check that the directions match the building's access arrangements before putting anything up.
Coordinator: The original signs look professional.
Volunteer: They do, but appearance doesn't tell us whether people can follow them. Visitors are moving through an unfamiliar space while carrying bags and looking for the right session.
Coordinator: Let's test the revised route with someone who hasn't seen the plan.
Volunteer: Good. If they reach the room independently, we'll have stronger evidence than our own feeling that the arrows are obvious. Familiarity makes many confusing routes look simple to the people who designed them.

Writing namuna — urinishdan keyin

Dear Kitchen Coordinator,
Thank you for explaining the current waste-measurement trial. I support collecting better evidence before changing the normal serving routine, and I can help record visitors' comments on Friday.
Could we ask both whether the initial portion is sufficient and whether people feel comfortable requesting more? The amount of leftover food is useful information, but it may not reveal whether a visitor leaves hungry or avoids asking for a second helping.
I also suggest recording unusual attendance alongside the daily figures. How many meals are served, and how much unused food remains after each session? Comparing similar days would make the results easier to interpret. Clear instructions should distinguish unavoidable scraps from food that could have been eaten, so volunteers record the same categories consistently.
Yours sincerely,
Saida Rahimova

Reading · Reading an Accommodation Review Carefully

An accommodation listing describes a guesthouse as central, peaceful and suitable for everyone. Recent reviews seem contradictory. One visitor calls the location excellent because the market is nearby. Another complains about early deliveries in the same street. Both accounts may be accurate: a convenient location can also be noisy at particular times.
A careful reader distinguishes a general description from a specific experience. 'The rooms are quiet' is broader than 'My room was quiet on a Sunday night.' Similarly, there is a lift does not establish that every entrance or bathroom is accessible. Small grammatical choices affect how much a claim appears to cover.
The owner is updating the listing with room positions, entrance details and typical delivery hours. Some colleagues fear that mentioning limitations will discourage bookings. Yet visitors who need silence or step-free access benefit from accurate information before paying, and unsuitable bookings create complaints later.
Reviews also need context. A family, a business traveller and someone attending a nearby event may judge the same feature differently. The best response is not to label one reviewer unreasonable, but to ask what the person needed and what the property actually provided. Clear descriptions support a better match between guests and accommodation, even when they produce fewer but more suitable reservations.

Listening · A Borrowing Service Explains Its Offer

Interviewer: Your centre lends equipment to local groups. What does a borrower actually receive?
Coordinator: Each booking includes a listed set of items and basic operating instructions. It doesn't include a technician at the event unless the group arranges that separately.
Interviewer: Is that distinction clear on the website?
Coordinator: It is clearer now. We used to describe the service as complete event support, which suggested more than we provide.
Interviewer: What is changing during the current review?
Coordinator: We are checking the lists inside every box and asking borrowers which instructions they find unclear. There are also new labels showing whose equipment each box contains.
Interviewer: Do people object to the more detailed conditions?
Coordinator: Some do, but most appreciate knowing what is available. For example, a projector has a power cable, but it may not have the adapter a particular laptop needs.
Interviewer: How do you help them identify that before collection?
Coordinator: We ask which device they use and send a photograph of the connection. We don't assume everyone knows the technical name.
Interviewer: So clear information is part of the service itself?
Coordinator: Exactly. A box full of useful objects is not useful to someone who cannot connect them. Accurate descriptions, practical questions and understandable instructions are as important as the inventory.

Mehmonxona tavsifidagi umumiy da’volarni aniq savollarga aylantiring; kamroq, lekin mosroq bronlar foydasini muhokama qiling. 2 daqiqa fikr bildiring, keyin sherikning qarshi savoliga 30 soniyada javob bering.

Mezon: Be, have/there is, artikl, olmosh va Present Simple/Continuous dan kamida to‘rtini ma’noga mos ishlatadi. · Matndan ikki dalil keltiradi, bir qarshi fikrni tan olib javob beradi. · Belgilangan vaqtni saqlab, bugungi grammatikadan kamida ikki aniq misol ishlatadi.

Mezon: Sharh kontekstini tahlil qiladi, ikki aniq savol va muvozanatli tavsiya beradi. · Qabul qiluvchi va janrga mos murojaat/uslubni saqlab, fikrlarni mantiqan bog‘laydi. · 180–200 so‘z chegarasini saqlaydi; maqsadli grammatikani kamida ikki marta aniq qo‘llaydi.

Writing namuna — urinishdan keyin

Contradictory accommodation reviews do not necessarily mean that one visitor is dishonest. People may experience the same place at times or need different things from it. I would read the details before trusting the rating.
A central guesthouse illustrates this well. The nearby market is convenient for one traveller, while early deliveries disturb another. Both comments can be useful. The question is whether that combination suits my own plans, not which reviewer wins the argument.
I also look at the scope of each claim. A quiet room on one Sunday night does not prove that every room is quiet throughout the week. Similarly, a building with a lift may still have steps at its entrance. Specific information matters more than a broad promise that a property suits everyone.
Before booking, I would ask which direction the room faces and when deliveries usually arrive. If access matters, I would request details of the route from the street to the room rather than rely on one general label.
Owners may fear that clear limitations discourage customers. However, accurate descriptions can prevent unsuitable reservations and later complaints. A good match is more valuable than a booking based on expectations the property cannot meet.

A Helpful Host or a Suitable Room?

120 daqiqalik uy vazifasining reading/listening qismi: 35 daqiqa; qo‘shimcha vaqt emas. 3 daqiqa taxmin; 12 daqiqa uzluksiz o‘qish; 15 daqiqa olti javob va dalil; 5 daqiqa tekshirish va bitta javobni yaxshilash.

A review of a guesthouse called its host 'kind and welcoming' and described the room as perfect for study. The first judgement was supported by a specific example: the host brought the visitor an extra blanket and explained the bus route patiently. The second claim needed closer examination. The room contained a chair and a narrow shelf, but no desk. Its window faced a busy courtyard, and deliveries began early.

The reviewer had stayed for one night after a walking trip. A new guest wanted to work there for three weeks. Both travellers could reasonably like the same host while needing different facilities. The booking page now separates information about people from information about the room. It lists furniture, measurements and typical delivery hours, alongside comments about hospitality.

The host was initially disappointed that the revised description sounded less enthusiastic. Later, she noticed that guests asked more precise questions before booking. She cannot guarantee that every visitor will be satisfied, but she can give them a clearer basis for choosing. A positive adjective is not a substitute for the practical detail needed to judge suitability.

To make the description more useful, the host measures the shelf and photographs it with an ordinary notebook on top. She avoids a wide camera angle that would make the surface look deeper. The delivery hours are described as typical, because the bakery next door occasionally changes its schedule. This qualification does not make the information worthless; it tells readers how much certainty they can reasonably expect.

The long-stay guest asks whether a table in the shared lounge can be reserved during working mornings. The host can offer it on four days, but a community group uses the lounge on Wednesdays. They agree to record those details in the booking message. A general promise that a suitable space will be available would conceal the one day when the arrangement fails.

Later, the host compares the questions from business travellers with those from holiday visitors. One group asks about sockets and seating; the other asks about walking routes and breakfast. She keeps both sets of details on the listing rather than deciding that one type of guest is more reasonable. A better match may sometimes mean suggesting another property. Losing an unsuitable booking can prevent disappointment and preserve trust more effectively than winning it with a description that sounds attractive but leaves essential conditions unexplained.
