The Square's Trial Weekend

The town square will be closed to private cars for one trial weekend next month. Temporary benches will be placed near the trees, and a marked delivery route will be kept open before ten each morning. The permanent parking layout will not be changed during the trial. That distinction matters because some residents have read the announcement as a final decision. Visitor numbers, shop sales and access problems will be recorded, but no single measure will determine the outcome. A busy square may benefit cafes while creating difficulties for other businesses. The report will therefore include comments from traders, disabled visitors and delivery drivers. Supporters want the experiment to succeed, yet a useful trial must be allowed to reveal problems. If every difficulty is dismissed as resistance, the evidence loses value. The mayor says the square will receive temporary furniture, not a temporary guarantee that everyone will agree. At least the benches should make the disagreement more comfortable.

A Notice Worth Reading

The housing office plans to replace the noticeboards in six apartment buildings. When will the new boards be installed? The published schedule says the work will begin on Monday, but gives no order for individual buildings. Residents also want to know how old notices will be handled. Important information must be copied before the boards are removed. Private phone numbers should not be displayed without permission, and commercial advertisements cannot be added by anyone who happens to find an empty corner. The office initially focused on colour and size. Those choices matter, but they do not answer questions about responsibility. A board can be designed beautifully and still be managed badly. The revised plan names a contact person for each building and explains how notices can be submitted. It also leaves space for handwritten community messages. Clear rules should protect useful communication without turning a request for a borrowed ladder into a formal research application.

The Repair Shop Window

When I visited the repair shop on Tuesday, an old radio was being examined on the main bench. Two chairs were being sanded near the window. I asked whether the radio could be repaired economically. The technician explained that a replacement part might cost more than a similar second-hand radio. Could the original case be kept while the inside was replaced? Technically, yes, but the owner valued its original sound as well as its appearance. The decision was therefore not only financial. While we talked, the owner arrived with a photograph of his father using the radio. That did not make every repair price reasonable, but it explained why a simple cost comparison was incomplete. The technician offered a written estimate and two options. Good repair advice should make choices clearer, not decide how much another person's memory is worth. The radio remained silent, but the conversation around it was unusually informative.

The Hall before the Meeting

When the residents arrived, the hall was not being cleaned as the booking email had suggested. Cleaning had been completed at noon, and the chairs had been arranged before three. The room was locked because a missing key had caused a delay. Was the entrance being repaired? No; a contractor was working on the office door farther along the corridor. Several people connected the visible tools with the locked hall and assumed the wrong cause. The organiser eventually found the spare key in a labelled cabinet. Afterwards, we compared the booking message with the actual sequence of events. It described an activity that was no longer happening and omitted the person responsible for opening the room. We changed the handover note to show completed tasks, current work and the key holder separately. A useful update should explain time as well as activity. Otherwise, yesterday's instruction can become today's very convincing misunderstanding.

The Exhibition Credit

A photograph in our exhibition carried the wrong photographer's name. The image had been donated by a family member, but the original creator had not been identified before printing. Had the donation form been checked? Yes, although the form named the donor rather than the photographer. Those roles had been treated as identical. A visitor recognised the picture and contacted the actual photographer, who was disappointed but willing to help correct the record. The label was replaced, and an explanation was added to the exhibition page. We did not simply remove the mistake quietly. The photographer wanted the correction to be visible because credit was part of the work's history. Our new form separates creator, donor and rights contact. It takes longer to complete, but the extra distinctions matter. A name beneath a picture is not decorative furniture. It tells readers whose effort they are seeing and whose permission may be needed.

The Reopening Report

The swimming pool will be reopened only after the final inspection. New filters have already been fitted, and damaged tiles were being replaced when the residents' committee visited on Tuesday. The changing rooms were not being used during that work. Had the emergency signs been checked before the visit? The manager showed a signed record confirming that they had. However, the accessible entrance had not been tested by users with mobility needs. The committee recommended a practical visit rather than relying only on measurements. Small difficulties can be missed on a drawing. The manager agreed that the route could be assessed by a local access group before opening. The report therefore records substantial progress without calling the pool ready. Some residents want a firm date, which is understandable after a long closure. Still, a date should follow completed checks rather than pressure staff to describe unfinished work as complete. A reopened door is useful only when people can actually get through it.

Two Accounts of One Meeting

After the residents' meeting, two summaries appeared in our group chat. One said the caretaker was against the new garden. The other said he supported it. I had taken notes, so I checked his actual words. He said he liked the idea but did not have time to water the beds every evening. He told the committee he could help with repairs at weekends. His objection concerned responsibility, not the garden itself. Both summaries had removed the condition that made his position understandable. I posted a fuller account and asked the writers to correct their messages. Neither had intended to mislead anyone; each had remembered the part that matched an existing opinion. Reporting speech is therefore more than changing pronouns and verbs. It requires selecting fairly. Our final minutes recorded support for the garden and a request for a separate watering team. A useful summary should shorten a discussion without shrinking the people in it into convenient labels.

The Promise in the Interview

On Monday, the organiser told our student reporter, 'We are preparing a free skills fair. We have contacted local employers, and we will publish the programme on Friday.' The reporter's draft said the organiser was preparing the fair, had contacted employers and would publish the programme on Friday. Those changes preserved the timing of the interview. However, the draft also said every employer would offer a job. That promise had never been made. The organiser had said employers could explain training routes, not guarantee employment. We corrected the article before publication and kept a short quotation beside the summary. The exercise showed that accurate grammar does not automatically produce accurate journalism. A sentence can have perfect backshift and still report an invented commitment. Our editor now asks two questions: does the language match the original time, and does the claim match what was actually said? Both checks matter more than making the event sound impressive.

Today Depends on the Reader

At the reception desk on Tuesday, Sara said, 'My class meets here every week, and I am bringing my materials tomorrow.' I wrote the message that afternoon for another receptionist in the same building. I could report that Sara said her class meets here every week because the timetable was still current. However, when I forwarded the note to a colleague in another building on Thursday, 'tomorrow' and 'here' no longer worked without explanation. I changed them to 'Wednesday' and 'the community centre'. The class schedule had not changed, but the reader's time and place had. This is why reported speech cannot always be handled by a mechanical replacement table. A clear date may be safer than 'the next day', especially in a forwarded message. We also checked that 'her materials' referred to Sara, not the receptionist. The final note was slightly longer, but it stopped asking readers to solve a small geographical and grammatical puzzle.

The Survey behind the Numbers

Our student council surveyed commuters before requesting a new bus stop. Volunteers asked whether passengers felt safe at the current stop and where they waited during rain. They also asked how long the walk from the college took. The survey leader told volunteers to record answers exactly and avoid suggesting the 'right' response. One draft question began, 'Don't you agree the stop is terrible?' We removed it because it pushed people towards a complaint. The final results were mixed: many wanted shelter, while fewer wanted the stop moved. If our report simply said people disliked the stop, it would hide that distinction. The council asked us to explain how the questions had been worded. That was a useful reminder that numbers depend partly on the questions behind them. A survey can sound official while still being poorly designed. Our strongest request became a shelter, supported by specific answers rather than a large but vague pile of dissatisfaction.

The Meeting without a Miracle

At our repair club meeting, the coordinator asked members to describe problems honestly. She told us not to promise repairs before checking the items. One volunteer offered to assess electrical equipment, while another refused to handle appliances without the required training. The refusal was sensible, not unhelpful. A third member admitted losing a customer's label and promised to contact the owner. Nobody denied that the mistake had caused confusion. We suggested using numbered trays so each item stayed with its paperwork. The minutes recorded these actions rather than a vague statement that everyone had discussed quality. That distinction matters after a meeting: people need to know who offered, who agreed and who still needs support. A cheerful atmosphere is valuable, but it cannot substitute for clear commitments. The club did not discover a miracle system that evening. It agreed on three small changes that people could actually carry out before the next session.

The Rumour about the Youth Room

A message claimed that the youth room would close permanently. The actual meeting notes said something different. The manager had explained that repairs would take two weeks and that activities could use the library during that period. A parent had asked whether evening sessions would continue. The manager had promised to check staffing, not guaranteed that every session would run. Someone shortened this into 'They don't know what they're doing', and the temporary move became a permanent closure in later messages. Our youth council published a correction with the confirmed dates and the unresolved question clearly separated. We also asked members not to forward claims without the original notice. The response was mostly positive, although one person complained that the correction was less dramatic than the rumour. That was true. Accurate information often has fewer villains and more conditions. It is still the information people need when arranging transport, work and childcare around a real service.

The People behind the Repair Table

A repair cafe depends on more than the person who holds the screwdriver. Our team includes a volunteer who welcomes visitors and a coordinator who keeps each item with its paperwork. The objects that arrive often carry stories as well as faults. Last week, a lamp that belonged to a retired teacher needed a new switch. The volunteer who assessed it asked about its history before discussing the repair. That conversation did not replace technical judgement, but it helped explain why the owner preferred repair to replacement. We also need a system that records limits honestly. Items that cannot be repaired safely are returned with an explanation, not a vague promise. Some visitors are disappointed, yet clear boundaries protect trust. The most useful volunteer is not always the one who says yes fastest. It may be the person who asks the question that prevents a well-intentioned but unsuitable repair.

The Market Archive

Our town archive is collecting stories from traders whose families have worked in the market for generations. The project began in the cafe where several retired sellers meet every Thursday. One woman remembers the winter when the old roof collapsed under heavy snow. Another recalls the year when refrigerated vans changed the fish trade. These memories connect personal experience with changes in the town, but dates sometimes conflict. The archivist records uncertainty rather than forcing every account into one neat timeline. A photograph whose owner is unknown can still be useful if its limits are stated. The team asks contributors to explain where their knowledge comes from: direct experience, a relative's story or a later newspaper report. This does not make the interviews less warm. It makes the archive more trustworthy. A market is a place where stories travel quickly; an archive is a place where they should also arrive with a source.

The Volunteer We Almost Missed

The volunteer who arrived late to our planning meeting became the person we most needed. Kamila, who works at a bus depot, noticed that our event timetable ignored the last service to the northern neighbourhoods. The schedule we had prepared looked convenient for the organising team, but several visitors would have struggled to get home. Our chair suggested simply telling people to leave early. Kamila argued that they should not have to miss the final discussion because of where they lived. We moved the closing session forward and kept an optional social hour afterwards. The change, which cost nothing, made the event more accessible. It also challenged our assumption that useful planning knowledge comes only from senior organisers. Kamila had no formal role in transport policy. She knew the route people used every evening. The person who notices an ordinary practical detail may contribute more than the person whose presentation has the most impressive title.

A Venue beyond the Photograph

The Riverside Centre, where our association held its first public meeting, looks ideal in promotional photographs. Its manager, whose team welcomes many community groups, is also helpful. However, a recent visit showed why a venue decision needs more than an attractive image. The room to which we were initially directed was upstairs, and the lift was too small for some mobility equipment. The room downstairs, which had fewer seats, offered easier access and a quieter entrance. We asked whether furniture could be rearranged to increase capacity without narrowing the route. The manager agreed to measure the space with us. This was not a dispute about whether the centre was 'good' or 'bad'. It was a discussion about which room suited our particular event. The people with whom we consulted included wheelchair users and parents with pushchairs. Their observations turned a general promise of welcome into a practical plan that could be checked.

The Queue Outside the Clinic

People waiting outside the community clinic had no shelter during last month's rain. A temporary canopy installed near the entrance now offers some protection. The clinic also introduced numbered cards, which reduced arguments about places in the queue. However, the new system created another problem: visitors unable to hear the number calls sometimes missed their turn. A volunteer suggested a visual display showing the current number. Staff tested a simple whiteboard before buying equipment, which allowed them to discover practical issues cheaply. The board placed behind the reception glass reflected light and was difficult to read. Moving it beside the door solved much of the problem. These changes show that an improvement can help one group while overlooking another. The team now asks visitors using different communication methods to test each stage. A fair queue is not created merely by giving everyone a number; people also need a reliable way to know when that number matters.

The Park Survey We Redesigned

The first park survey reached people who already attended weekend events. Residents whose working hours included Saturdays were largely absent. The committee initially called the results representative, which overstated what the evidence could show. We redesigned the survey with short interviews at the bus stop where commuters waited and a paper version delivered to nearby buildings. Responses collected through the new routes raised different priorities: lighting, toilets and weekday seating mattered more than another festival stage. This did not make the first respondents wrong. It showed that the people we had asked were only part of the community. The report now explains each collection method and the groups still missing from the sample. The council officer to whom we sent it requested a follow-up discussion. A survey becomes more credible when it admits its limits. The most polished chart cannot give a voice to residents who were never asked a question in the first place.

Why We Changed the Workshop

Our photography club decided to redesign its beginner workshop after several learners avoided returning for a second session. They enjoyed taking pictures but disliked spending most of the evening watching slides. The tutor had hoped to explain every camera setting before allowing practice. That plan seemed thorough, yet it asked beginners to remember too much without using it. We invited learners to describe one task they wanted to achieve. Most wanted to photograph people indoors without producing a bright forehead and a dark background. The new session begins with that practical problem. Learners try a simple adjustment, compare results and then discuss the principle. We still expect them to understand the settings, but explanation follows an immediate need. The change is not an argument against theory. It is an argument for a sequence that makes theory useful. A camera course should leave people wanting to take photographs, not merely admiring the instructor's impressive collection of menus.

Learning from a Broken Display

The museum let our student team test a new interactive display before opening it to visitors. We could explore the controls, but we had to avoid changing the stored information. One unexpected screen message made us laugh: it congratulated us on selecting no options at all. The joke revealed a real problem. The display allowed people to continue without making a meaningful choice. We went through the activity again to identify the point where instructions became unclear. Several students were interested in improving the wording, while others focused on the size of the buttons. Instead of arguing about personal preference, we asked two first-time users to try the display. Their difficulties helped us decide what to change. Testing did not prove that our final version would suit everyone, but it gave us better evidence than guessing. When Instructions Become Work

Reading the instructions for our booking form took longer than completing the form itself. The guide was accurate, but it was too dense to use quickly at the reception desk. Important warnings sat between background explanations and technical definitions. We tested a shorter version with new volunteers. Finding the next step became easier, although some unusual cases still required the full guide. The solution was not to delete complexity entirely. We created a short action sheet and linked each section to the detailed reference. Using plain language helped people notice the exceptions instead of hiding them in a wall of text. The new sheet was clear enough to support routine tasks, but not broad enough to answer every possible question. That limit was stated at the top. Good instructions do not promise to remove all judgement. They make ordinary decisions easier and show users when to seek help. Our reception desk now has fewer pages and fewer panicked whispers.

A Different Way to Commute

I used to drive to the training centre, but the new parking fee encouraged me to try taking the bus. At first, I was not used to waiting outside in bad weather. I tried to read on the journey, but motion made that uncomfortable, so I tried listening to short audio lessons instead. That worked better. One morning, I stopped to buy a ticket and forgot to collect the receipt I needed for reimbursement. I remember telling the driver about my course, but not checking the machine. Now I set a reminder to keep the receipt. The change has not made every journey pleasant. Some buses are crowded, and the evening connection is unreliable. Still, I have stopped assuming that driving is always the only practical choice. A trial should allow mixed results. Otherwise, one wet morning becomes proof against buses, while years of traffic delays somehow count as normal life.

The Shared Office Adjustment

Our charity recently moved into a shared office, and we are getting used to working beside two other teams. At first, small habits caused surprising tension. We turned the heating up while our neighbours opened a window. We depended on informal messages, but nobody knew who was responsible for locking up. After a meeting, we wrote a short agreement and had the faulty door lock replaced. We also got the meeting-room screen repaired instead of asking volunteers to fix it without training. The agreement includes turning lights off, looking after shared equipment and checking with other teams before moving furniture. These rules are not a substitute for courtesy, but they reduce repeated uncertainty. I am interested in how quickly trust improves when responsibilities become visible. A shared office does not require everyone to work in the same way. It requires people to notice where one team's convenient habit becomes another team's daily problem.

24-haftadagi fe’l qoliplarini dalilli taklif va rasmiy xatda birlashtiraman.

A Better Welcome for New Members

Our community workshop wants to attract new members without overwhelming them. We used to begin with a long tour and ask everyone to remember every rule immediately. Several newcomers admitted feeling lost, although they appreciated the volunteers' friendliness. We decided to try offering a short welcome task instead. A trained member helps each person to label a sample item, find the correct storage place and practise recording a loan. Doing one complete task makes the wider system easier to understand. We still expect people to read the safety information, and they must not use unfamiliar equipment without guidance. The team also had damaged signs replaced and is getting used to explaining fewer details at once. Some experienced members worry that the new approach is too simple. We will therefore review errors and newcomer feedback after four sessions. The aim is not to remove standards. It is to help people reach them through a sequence they can actually follow.

Manager: New library cards will be introduced in November. Existing memberships will be transferred automatically.
Reader: Will people lose their borrowing history?
Manager: No. That information will be kept unless a reader asks for it to be removed. Personal details won't be displayed on the public catalogue.
Reader: Some older members may struggle with the online form.
Manager: Paper forms will be provided at the desk, and staff will help during two drop-in sessions each week.
Reader: Good. A digital improvement shouldn't make familiar services harder to reach.
Manager: Exactly. The old cards won't be switched off until the help sessions have run for a month.
Reader: How will members hear about that?
Manager: Notices will be posted in the building and sent with loan reminders. We will also explain the change at the desk. A new card should open access, not become a tiny plastic test of computer confidence.

Reading javoblari

1. one weekend / a weekend / weekend — “One trial weekend” — bitta dam olish kunlari davri.

2. ten / 10 / before ten / 10 am — “Before ten each morning” — ertalab o‘ngacha.

3. the parking layout / parking layout / permanent parking layout — “Permanent parking layout will not be changed” — doimiy to‘xtash joylari rejasi.

Listening javoblari

1. November / in November — “In November” — noyabrda.

2. twice a week / two times a week / two sessions each week — “Two drop-in sessions each week” — haftada ikki.

3. paper forms / a paper form / paper form — “Paper forms will be provided” — qog‘oz shakllar.

Writing namunasi

New library cards will be introduced in November, and current memberships will be transferred automatically. Borrowing history will be retained unless a reader requests its removal. Personal details will not be shown in the public catalogue. Paper forms will be available for members who prefer them, and help will be offered twice a week. Old cards will not be disabled until those sessions have been running for a month. This gradual change should protect access while the system improves. Notices will be displayed in the library and included with loan reminders. Staff should also explain the process personally, because a written announcement does not reach every reader equally well.

Producer: When will the new recorder be delivered?
Coordinator: On Wednesday. It can be borrowed after the introductory session on Friday.
Producer: Can the files be stored on our own computers?
Coordinator: Yes, but participants' permission must be recorded first. Private interviews mustn't be shared in the public folder.
Producer: Where will the training materials be posted?
Coordinator: On the club page, with a printed copy at reception. The device can also be demonstrated in person.
Producer: That helps. Some members learn better by trying the controls.
Coordinator: Exactly. The equipment should be accessible, but recordings need careful handling. A convenient folder is not automatically an appropriate audience.
Producer: I'll make a project folder and check permissions before sharing anything.
Coordinator: Good. We bought a recorder to preserve voices, not to give every private conversation an accidental public performance. That protects both interviewers and guests.

Reading javoblari

1. six / 6 — “Six apartment buildings” — oltita.

2. important information must be copied / copy important information — “Important information must be copied” — muhim ma’lumot ko‘chiriladi.

3. private phone numbers / personal phone numbers / phone numbers — “Private phone numbers … without permission” — shaxsiy raqamlar.

Listening javoblari

1. Wednesday / on Wednesday — “On Wednesday” — chorshanba.

2. after Friday's introductory session / after the introductory session / after the session on Friday — “After the introductory session on Friday” — juma tanishtiruvidan keyin.

3. private interviews / private recordings — “Private interviews mustn't be shared” — shaxsiy intervyular.

Writing namunasi

Before the old noticeboards are removed, important information must be copied. Residents should be told when each building will receive its replacement. Private phone numbers must not be displayed without permission, and commercial notices should be checked by a named contact person. Community messages can be submitted through that person or left at the housing office. The board should still allow simple handwritten requests, because not every useful message needs a polished design. Clear management matters as much as the board's colour or size. The final notice should answer two questions directly: when will installation happen, and who will be responsible for keeping the information current?

123-dars / Ustoz kaliti

Oldindan: sand — silliqlamoq, socket — rozetka, handover — ishni topshirish. Readingda narx/qiymat mezonini ajrating; listeningni ikki bor o‘qib jarayon uzilishini toping. Sekin o‘quvchiga was being tayanchi; ilg‘orga qarorning insoniy mezonini izohlash.

Listening transkripti

Organiser: Could the stage be moved closer to the wall next time?
Technician: Possibly. When I arrived yesterday, it was being assembled in the middle because the wall sockets were being checked.
Organiser: Could the cables be covered more securely?
Technician: Yes. Extra covers can be hired. The team was being shown the cable route when the first musicians arrived, which interrupted the briefing.
Organiser: So an earlier setup would help.
Technician: It would, but we also need a clear handover. People shouldn't guess which checks are complete.
Organiser: Can the final inspection be recorded on one sheet?
Technician: Certainly. Name the person responsible for each item and leave space for unresolved issues.
Organiser: That sounds more useful than simply writing 'all fine'.
Technician: Exactly. A check sheet should describe reality, not offer the room an encouraging compliment before the audience walks in.

Reading javoblari

1. an old radio / old radio / the radio / radio / a radio — “An old radio was being examined” — radio.

2. two / 2 — “Two chairs” — ikkita.

3. a photograph of his father / photograph of his father / a photo of his father / photo of his father / a photograph / photograph / a photo / photo — “A photograph of his father using the radio” — otasi surati.

Listening javoblari

1. the wall sockets were being checked / wall sockets were being checked / socket checks / the sockets were being checked / sockets were being checked — “Because the wall sockets were being checked” — rozetkalar tekshiruvi.

2. the musicians arrived / musicians arrived / arrival of the first musicians / musicians arriving — “The first musicians arrived” — musiqachilar kelishi.

3. one sheet / a check sheet / check sheet / an inspection sheet / inspection sheet — “Recorded on one sheet” — bitta tekshiruv varag‘i.

Writing namunasi

When the technician arrived, the stage was being assembled away from the wall because the sockets were being checked. The cable route was being explained when musicians interrupted the briefing. Could setup begin earlier next time? That would help, but timing alone would not solve every problem. Extra cable covers can be hired, and the final inspection can be recorded on one sheet. Each item should name the responsible person and show any unresolved issue. A general statement that everything is fine gives little useful information. A clear handover would help the next team understand what has been checked and what still needs attention before the audience arrives.

124-dars / Ustoz kaliti

Oldindan: contractor — pudratchi, seal — muhrlab yopmoq, status — holat. Readingda vaqt jadvalini chizing; dialogni ikki bor o‘qib completed/unfinishedni belgilang. Sekin o‘quvchiga before/when tayanchi; ilg‘orga qisqa, ammo aniq holat nomlarini yaratish.

Listening transkripti

Supervisor: Was the order being packed when you arrived at nine?
Assistant: No, it wasn't being packed then. The boxes had been sealed before my shift started.
Supervisor: Had the labels been printed too?
Assistant: Yes. They had been placed beside the boxes, but nobody had attached them.
Supervisor: So the order was not ready for collection.
Assistant: Correct. The driver was waiting, and I initially thought the labels on the desk belonged to another order.
Supervisor: Was the packing area being used by another team?
Assistant: No. The confusion came from the status note. It said 'packed', which sounded complete.
Supervisor: We need separate stages for sealed, labelled and ready to collect.
Assistant: Agreed. One short word was doing three jobs badly. A little more detail would have saved the driver from a long discussion with a pile of anonymous boxes.

Reading javoblari

1. at noon / noon / 12 noon — “Completed at noon” — tush payti.

2. a missing key / missing key / the key was missing / key was missing / a key delay / key delay — “A missing key had caused a delay” — kalit yo‘q edi.

3. the office door / office door — “The office door farther along the corridor” — idora eshigi.

Listening javoblari

1. nine / 9 / at nine — “At nine” — to‘qqizda.

2. sealed / they had been sealed / the boxes had been sealed / boxes had been sealed — “The boxes had been sealed” — yopib muhrlangan.

3. the labels / labels — “Nobody had attached them” — yorliqlar.

Writing namunasi

The order was not being packed when the assistant arrived at nine. The boxes had been sealed before the shift began, and the labels had been printed. However, the labels were still on the desk, so the order was not ready for collection. The status word packed hid that unfinished step. We should use separate labels for sealed, labelled and ready to collect. A final check should connect each box with its delivery information. This change would give both staff and drivers a clearer picture of progress. Short updates are useful only when their meaning is shared. Otherwise, saving a few words can create a much longer delay.

Leader: Had our seats been reserved before the payment deadline?
Agent: The request had been entered by your colleague, but the seats hadn't been confirmed. Payment was still missing.
Leader: I thought the email was a confirmation.
Agent: It was an acknowledgement of the request. The subject line was not clear enough, and I understand the confusion.
Leader: Had a reminder been sent?
Agent: Yes, but it went to the address on the form. Your colleague says that mailbox is no longer checked.
Leader: Then both our details and your wording need attention.
Agent: Agreed. I can offer another departure with enough seats, but it leaves an hour later.
Leader: Please hold it while I contact the group.
Agent: I will send a message explicitly marked 'held, not paid'. We should not make a booking depend on interpreting polite but ambiguous language.

Reading javoblari

1. a family member / family member — “Donated by a family member” — oila a’zosi.

2. the donor / donor — “Named the donor rather than the photographer” — hadya qiluvchi.

3. credit was part of the work's history / to give proper credit / proper attribution — “Credit was part of the work's history” — mualliflik tarixi uchun.

Listening javoblari

1. the leader's colleague / leader's colleague / a colleague / colleague / the colleague / his colleague / her colleague — “Entered by your colleague” — rahbarning hamkasbi.

2. payment was missing / no payment / they hadn't paid — “Payment was still missing” — to‘lov yo‘q.

3. an hour / hour / one hour / 1 hour — “An hour later” — bir soat.

Writing namunasi

The photographer had not been identified before the exhibition label was printed. The donation form had been checked, but it named the donor, not the creator. A family member had supplied the image, and the team incorrectly treated that person as its photographer. The correction should therefore be visible rather than quietly replacing one name with another. Credit forms part of the picture's history. Our new form should distinguish creator, donor and permission contact. Each role answers a different question. This will add work at the beginning, but it will reduce confusion later and show respect for the people whose images make the exhibition possible.

126-dars / Ustoz kaliti

Oldindan: filter — filtr, audit — tekshiruv, mobility — harakatlanish. 6-kun readingni completed/ongoing/pendingga ajrating; listeningni ikki bor o‘qib ro‘yxatni tekshiring. Sekin o‘quvchiga passiv jadval; ilg‘orga ochilish mezonini dalil bilan asoslash.

Auditor: Will the borrowed speakers be returned tomorrow?
Organiser: Yes. They must be checked before transport. One cable was being repaired when I left the workshop.
Auditor: Had the equipment list been updated before collection?
Organiser: Most of it had, but the extra microphone hadn't been added. It was supplied by the school at the last minute.
Auditor: Can that be corrected now?
Organiser: Yes. The microphone is here, and the school has confirmed its number.
Auditor: Good. The return record should show each item and its condition. Was anything being used during the final count?
Organiser: No. Everything was on the table, though two cases were closed.
Auditor: Then open them and check the contents. An empty case can look impressively complete from outside.
Organiser: Agreed. We need evidence of the equipment, not just a tidy photograph of its luggage.

Reading javoblari

1. damaged tiles / the tiles / tiles — “Damaged tiles were being replaced” — shikastlangan plitkalar.

2. the accessible entrance / accessible entrance — “The accessible entrance had not been tested” — qulay kirish.

3. a local access group / local access group / the local access group / an access group / access group — “By a local access group” — qulaylik guruhi.

Listening javoblari

1. tomorrow — “Returned tomorrow” — ertaga.

2. the extra microphone / extra microphone / a microphone / microphone / the microphone — “The extra microphone hadn't been added” — qo‘shimcha mikrofon.

3. the school / school — “Supplied by the school” — maktab.

Writing namunasi

The pool should not be described as ready until the remaining checks are complete. New filters have been fitted, and damaged tiles were being replaced during Tuesday's visit. Emergency signs had been checked, but the accessible entrance had not been tested by people with mobility needs. That route can be assessed by a local access group before reopening. Measurements are useful, yet they may miss practical difficulties. A firm opening date will be welcomed by residents, but it should follow evidence rather than replace it. The report should show completed work, outstanding checks and responsible people. This gives the public a clearer basis for judging progress and trusting the eventual reopening.

127-dars / Ustoz kaliti

Oldindan: minutes — yig‘ilish bayoni, objection — e’tiroz, mislead — chalg‘itmoq. Readingda ikki noto‘liq xulosani solishtiring; dialogni ikki bor o‘qib aniq fikrlarni yozing. Sekin o‘quvchiga said/told jadvali; ilg‘orga betaraf sarlavha yozdiring.

Listening transkripti

Assistant: The customer said the whole workshop was useless.
Manager: Did she use those words?
Assistant: Not exactly. She said she didn't understand the online instructions. She told me the practical demonstration was helpful.
Manager: Then we should keep both points. Otherwise, we might change the wrong part of the service.
Assistant: She also said she wanted more time to practise before the final task.
Manager: That's a specific request. Did she say the tutor was unhelpful?
Assistant: No. She said he answered questions clearly, but the group was too large.
Manager: Good. Write that accurately. We need feedback we can act on, not a dramatic headline.
Assistant: I see the difference. My summary turned several useful comments into one negative judgement.
Manager: It happens easily. Listening fairly means preserving the parts that complicate our first impression, even when a shorter story would fit neatly into the message box.

Reading javoblari

1. watering every evening / watering the beds every evening / daily watering — “Did not have time to water … every evening” — kechki sug‘orish.

2. repairs at weekends / weekend repairs / help with repairs — “Help with repairs at weekends” — dam olish kunlari ta’mir.

3. no / no he wasn't / no he was not — “His objection concerned responsibility, not the garden” — loyiha emas, vazifa masalasi.

Listening javoblari

1. online instructions / the online instructions — “Didn't understand the online instructions” — onlayn yo‘riqnoma.

2. the practical demonstration / practical demonstration / the demonstration / demonstration — “The practical demonstration was helpful” — amaliy ko‘rsatish.

3. the group was too large / group was too large / group size / a large group / large group — “The group was too large” — guruh kattaligi.

Writing namunasi

The customer said she did not understand the online instructions, but she told the assistant that the practical demonstration was helpful. She also said she wanted more time to practise before the final task. Her comments did not describe the whole workshop as useless. She praised the tutor's clear answers while pointing out that the group was too large. A fair summary should preserve this mixed view. The centre could review the written instructions, allow extra practice and consider group size. Changing the practical demonstration would not address the concern she actually raised. Accurate reporting helps the team improve the right part of the service rather than react to an exaggerated headline.

128-dars / Ustoz kaliti

Oldindan: backshift — zamonni orqaga siljitish, commitment — majburiyatli va’da, pump — nasos. Readingda original va xulosani ulang; listeningni ikki bor o‘qib va’da chegarasini belgilang. Sekin o‘quvchiga vaqt juftlari; ilg‘orga grammatik to‘g‘ri, mazmunan noto‘g‘ri gapni tuzatish.

Listening transkripti

Supervisor: What did the engineer tell you yesterday?
Assistant: She said she was checking the damaged pump. She said she had ordered a replacement part and could return on Thursday.
Supervisor: Did she promise the system would work that day?
Assistant: No. She said she would test it after fitting the part, but she couldn't guarantee the result before that test.
Supervisor: Good. Our notice must not turn an expected visit into a confirmed reopening.
Assistant: I wrote that the engineer had ordered the part and would return for further work. Is that clear enough?
Supervisor: Add that testing is still required. Residents need to understand the remaining condition.
Assistant: Understood. The original update was careful, but it would be easy to make it sound more certain while shortening it.
Supervisor: Exactly. A summary should remove extra words, not remove the uncertainty that keeps the message honest.

Reading javoblari

1. Friday / on Friday — “Will publish … Friday” — juma.

2. local employers / employers — “Have contacted local employers” — mahalliy ish beruvchilar.

3. jobs / guaranteed jobs / employment / a job for everyone / job for everyone — “Not guarantee employment” — kafolatli ish va’da qilinmagan.

Listening javoblari

1. a replacement part / replacement part / the replacement part / a part / part — “Had ordered a replacement part” — ehtiyot qism.

2. Thursday / on Thursday — “Could return on Thursday” — payshanba.

3. testing / a test / test / the test — “Testing is still required” — sinov.

Writing namunasi

The engineer said she was checking the damaged pump and had ordered a replacement part. She told the team she could return on Thursday. She did not promise that the system would reopen that day. Instead, she said she would test it after the part was fitted and could not guarantee the result before testing. Our public notice should preserve that condition. An expected visit is evidence of progress, but it is not a confirmed completion date. The team should publish another update after the test. This wording may sound less exciting than a reopening announcement, yet it gives residents a more accurate basis for planning.

129-dars / Ustoz kaliti

Oldindan: forward — qayta yubormoq, current — dolzarb, reference point — ishora nuqtasi. Readingda gapirish/o‘qish vaqtini ajrating; dialogni ikki bor o‘qib uch ishorani tekshiring. Sekin o‘quvchiga kim-qayer-qachon jadvali; ilg‘orga uch kundan keyingi qayta yuborishni yozdiring.

Listening transkripti

Coordinator: Nargiza says her workshop starts at six. That timetable is still correct, so keep the present tense in today's reminder.
Assistant: Yesterday she wrote, 'I will bring my samples here tomorrow.' We're sending this to the remote volunteers now. Should I keep here?
Coordinator: No. Say she would bring her samples to the arts centre today. Better still, include Wednesday's date so the message remains clear if it is forwarded later.
Assistant: And my becomes her because the samples belong to Nargiza.
Coordinator: Exactly. Don't change words simply because a chart tells you to. Think about who is speaking, where the reader is and when they read it.
Assistant: The facts stay the same, but the reference points move.
Coordinator: Yes. A message should travel better than a suitcase without a label. Every reader needs to know whose materials are going to which place on which day.

Reading javoblari

1. Tuesday / on Tuesday — “On Tuesday, Sara said” — seshanba.

2. Wednesday — Matnda “Wednesday” aniq kun sifatida tanlangan; seshanbadagi “tomorrow” chorshanbani anglatadi.

3. the timetable was still current / timetable was still current / the schedule was still current / schedule was still current / it was still true — “Because the timetable was still current” — jadval dolzarb.

Listening javoblari

1. six / 6 / at six — “Starts at six” — oltida.

2. to the arts centre / the arts centre / arts centre — “To the arts centre” — san’at markaziga.

3. Nargiza — “The samples belong to Nargiza” — Nargizaniki.

Writing namunasi

Sara said her class meets at the community centre every week. The present tense is suitable because that schedule is still current. She also said on Tuesday that she would bring her materials on Wednesday. In a message forwarded on Thursday, keeping tomorrow would give the wrong day. Keeping here would also confuse a reader in another building. The report should name the community centre and use an explicit date. Her materials must clearly refer to Sara's belongings. These choices preserve the original meaning rather than mechanically changing every verb. A slightly longer message can be more efficient if it prevents several readers from asking the same clarification question.

130-dars / Ustoz kaliti

Oldindan: commuter — qatnovchi, shelter — pana joy, step-free — zinapoyasiz. Readingda savol tarafkashligini aniqlang; dialogni ikki bor o‘qib amaliy tafsilotlarni toping. Sekin o‘quvchiga asked + if/where; ilg‘orga yo‘naltiruvchi savolni betaraf yozish.

Listening transkripti

Receptionist: A visitor asked whether the gallery had step-free access. She also asked where the nearest accessible toilet was.
Manager: Did you explain the route clearly?
Receptionist: Yes. I told her to use the side entrance, but she asked if that door would be open after six.
Manager: That's an important detail. It normally closes at five thirty.
Receptionist: I said I would check rather than guess. She asked how she could contact someone on arrival.
Manager: Give her the duty phone number and confirm the entrance arrangement in writing.
Receptionist: I'll do that. Her questions show that simply saying 'accessible' isn't enough.
Manager: Exactly. People need a route that works at the time they visit, not only a description that is true during office hours.
Receptionist: I'll add opening times to our access information. A helpful adjective needs some practical details beside it.

Reading javoblari

1. shelter / a shelter — “Many wanted shelter” — pana joy.

2. record answers exactly / record the answers exactly — “To record answers exactly” — javoblarni aynan qayd etish.

3. it was leading / it pushed people towards a complaint / it suggested the answer — “Pushed people towards a complaint” — javobga undagan.

Listening javoblari

1. the side entrance / side entrance — “Use the side entrance” — yon kirish.

2. five thirty / 5:30 / at five thirty / 5.30 pm — “At five thirty” — besh yarim.

3. the duty phone number / duty phone number / a duty phone number / duty phone — “The duty phone number” — navbatchi raqami.

Writing namunasi

A visitor asked whether the gallery offered step-free access and where the nearest accessible toilet was. The receptionist told her to use the side entrance. However, the visitor also asked if that door would be open after six, and it normally closes at five thirty. She then asked how she could contact someone when she arrived. We should confirm an entrance arrangement before reassuring her. The duty phone number and a written route would help. This enquiry shows why a general description such as accessible needs practical detail. Opening times, contact information and the actual route must work together for the visitor's particular journey.

Listening transkripti

Chair: Please summarise the promises from yesterday, not just the complaints.
Secretary: The caterer apologised for arriving late and offered to refund the delivery fee. She denied ignoring our calls; her phone had lost power.
Chair: And the venue manager?

Chair: Did we agree?
Secretary: Yes. We also admitted changing the count at the last minute. Lara suggested appointing one contact person for all suppliers.
Chair: Good. Include that shared responsibility.
Secretary: I will. A report that makes every problem somebody else's fault would be simpler, but less useful.
Chair: Exactly. We need a plan for the next event, not a carefully formatted collection of excuses with our logo at the top.

The caterer offered to refund the delivery fee after arriving late. She denied ignoring the team's calls and explained that her phone had lost power. The venue manager promised to provide a direct contact number. He asked the team to send the final guest count two days earlier and told them not to block the service entrance. The team admitted changing the number at the last minute. Lara suggested appointing one person to communicate with all suppliers. These points should appear together in the report because responsibility was shared. Clear commitments will help the next event more than a summary that presents the organisers as faultless and everyone else as the problem.

They told us to distinguish initial costs from monthly expenses. They also suggested a small pilot to test demand before expansion. Importantly, they offered to review a revised plan next month. This was neither an unconditional approval nor a complete rejection. Our team should use the written comments to prepare specific changes. A fair summary will help everyone understand the opportunity and the work attached to it. We should report both the positive assessment and the conditions instead of choosing the more dramatic version.

The welcome volunteer is the person who connects visitors with the right member of the repair team. They record the problem that each visitor describes and keep the item with its form. They should not give technical advice that goes beyond their training. A customer who expects an immediate answer can be introduced to the volunteer who carries out assessments. This role requires patience and clear communication, not just a friendly manner. The form that the team uses should explain the next step. A supervised first session would help a new volunteer practise these tasks and learn when to ask for support rather than make an uncertain promise.

The market archive should preserve the voices of traders whose experience connects personal lives with local history. Interviews can begin in the cafe where retired sellers already meet. Contributors may remember the year when a new roof was built or a different trading system appeared. Their dates may not always agree, and that uncertainty should remain visible. A photograph whose owner is unknown should be labelled honestly rather than given an invented history. The team should ask whether each detail comes from direct experience, a family story or a written source. This approach respects contributors while giving future readers enough information to understand the evidence and its limits.

I am writing about the room for our association's public meeting. The Riverside Centre, where we held our first event, remains our preferred venue. However, the upstairs room may not suit participants who use larger mobility equipment.
Could you confirm whether the downstairs room is available on 18 June from two to five? We would also appreciate a seating plan showing how many chairs can be arranged while keeping a clear route from the entrance. The members with whom we consulted emphasised the importance of that space.
Your team, whose assistance we value, offered to measure the room with us. Would Tuesday afternoon be convenient for a short visit? Please also confirm whether any furniture can be removed temporarily.
Thank you for helping us plan an event that all participants can use comfortably.
Yours sincerely,

Visitors spending a long time at a display are not necessarily highly engaged. In our test, several people were struggling with small text, which changed the meaning of the observation. Labels printed in a larger size helped, but those placed too low were hidden by other visitors. The next test should include people standing, sitting and using mobility equipment. Volunteers observing from different positions can identify problems that a single viewpoint misses. We should combine timing with direct questions about the experience. Otherwise, a measurement that looks positive may conceal difficulty. Useful evaluation asks what the behaviour means, not only how long it lasts.

Dear Mr Ahmed,
I am writing about the park survey that our committee recently revised. The original responses came mainly from people who attend Saturday events. Residents whose jobs keep them busy at weekends were not adequately represented, which limited the conclusions we could draw.
We have now added interviews at the bus stop where commuters wait and paper forms delivered to nearby buildings. The responses collected through these routes place greater emphasis on lighting, toilets and weekday seating.
Could you arrange a meeting to review these priorities before the next spending decision? We would also appreciate information about groups that the council believes are still missing from the survey. The report, which explains both collection methods, is ready for discussion.
Thank you for considering a broader evidence base rather than treating the first chart as a complete picture.

The club decided to begin its workshop with a practical indoor photograph. Learners enjoy taking pictures, but they avoid returning when the session feels like a long tour of camera menus. The tutor should ask them to identify one problem and help them to test a simple adjustment. They can then compare results before studying the explanation. This does not mean removing theory. It means connecting theory to a task learners want to achieve. I would also suggest keeping the first practice short so everyone has time to discuss it. A successful introductory session should encourage people to continue learning rather than convince them that photography requires memorising everything at once.

Researcher: Then two focused questions may be enough to guide the next session. It's important to leave space for an unexpected concern too.
Coordinator: Is that enough information to evaluate the whole programme?
Researcher: No. A quick exit form is not detailed enough to judge long-term change. We need a later follow-up for that.

Collecting feedback is useful only when the team knows how the answers will inform decisions. Our current form is too long to complete before participants leave. Two focused questions could be enough to improve the next session: was the explanation clear, and what needs more practice? It is also important to allow an unexpected concern. However, an exit form is not detailed enough to demonstrate lasting change. That requires a later follow-up. Shortening the form should therefore support a specific purpose rather than create an illusion of complete evaluation. Asking fewer, better questions can save time while leaving room for a different method when deeper evidence is needed.

Our reception team is getting used to working with your booking software after several years of paper records. We are trying to use it consistently, but the system sometimes gives no confirmation after changes are saved.
On Tuesday, an assistant remembered saving an updated list and tried refreshing the page. One name was still missing. She stopped entering further bookings to investigate and checked the final list carefully.
Could you provide a clear recovery guide covering missing confirmations and incomplete records? We would also appreciate a short training session focused on errors rather than normal operation. Please explain how staff can verify that an update has been stored without creating duplicate bookings.
We would be grateful for a reply by Friday so that we can plan next week's reception cover.

Writing namunasi

Our team is getting used to sharing an office with two other organisations. We initially depended on informal messages, which left some responsibilities unclear. After discussing the problems, we had the faulty lock replaced and got the meeting-room screen repaired by a technician. The new agreement asks everyone to turn lights off, look after shared equipment and check before moving furniture. These rules help us cooperate without expecting identical working habits. They also show when professional help is needed. Being interested in repairs is not the same as being qualified to perform them. Clear responsibilities protect both equipment and relationships, leaving more time for the work our teams actually came to do.

Listening transkripti

Director: Why do you recommend changing the induction session?
Coordinator: New volunteers enjoy helping people, but they struggle to remember twenty procedures before trying any of them. I suggest starting with one supervised task.
Director: Would that be enough to prepare them?
Coordinator: Enough for a first step, not for independent work. We would still require them to read the safety guide and ask before using unfamiliar equipment.
Director: What else needs attention?
Coordinator: We should have the unclear signs replaced. We also need to stop assuming that silence means understanding.
Director: How will you check the new approach?
Coordinator: By observing errors, listening to feedback and asking volunteers to explain the next step in their own words.
Director: Good. Please send a written proposal with a four-session review point. A simpler beginning is useful if it leads to stronger understanding, not if it merely makes the timetable look less demanding.

Dear Ms Rahim,
I am writing to propose a revised introduction for new workshop volunteers. Several newcomers have admitted feeling overwhelmed by the number of procedures presented before they can practise anything.
I suggest beginning with one supervised task: labelling an item, finding its storage place and recording a loan. Completing this sequence should make the system easier to understand. Volunteers would still be required to read the safety guide and ask before using unfamiliar equipment.
We should also have the unclear signs replaced and stop treating silence as evidence of understanding. Could you approve a four-session trial of this approach? We would review errors, collect feedback and ask participants to explain the next step in their own words.
Please let me know whether the trial can begin next month and who should coordinate the review.
Yours sincerely,
Malika Saidova
